THE OPENING ADDRESS.

By E. S. Cox (President).

Read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution, 14*th November*, 1927.

ELECTION OF HONORARY MEMBER.

The President opened the proceedings by referring to the generous hospitality extended by the Right Hon. the Earl Fitzwilliam to members taking part in the Annual Country Meeting, which was held at Harrogate last June. During that meeting a large party visited Wentworth Woodhouse, his Lordship's well-known Yorkshire seat, where a programme of exceptional interest had been prepared for their entertainment, and where they met with truly Yorkshire hospitality.

As they all knew, Lord Fitzwilliam was a man of very wide interests, which brought him into touch with their profession at many points. He (the President) suggested that they might show their appreciation of the courtesy extended by his Lordship to The Institution in June last in the only way in their power, namely, by electing him as an Honorary Member. By so doing they would, in his opinion, be doing honour to The Institution as well as to Lord Fitzwilliam.

The President then formally moved that the Right Hon. the Earl Fitzwilliam, K.C.V.O., D.S.O., &c., be elected an Honorary Member of The Institution. On the resolution being put to the meeting, it was carried unanimously with acclamation.

NEW MEMBERS.

The President then delivered his Presidential Address as follows :—

In having been elected as President of this great Institution, I feel that I can do no less than convey my best thanks to you for having placed me in a position of so much responsibility, a position that has been held by so many eminent men before me, and the highest honour to which any member of our profession can hope to attain. I trust that with your kind forbearance I shall carry out the duties to your satisfaction; as I have the welfare of The Institution at heart I shall do my best.

The last occasion on which a President from Yorkshire occupied this Chair was during the first year of the war, 1915. My old friend Mr. J. H. Hanson had therefore little difficulty in selecting a text for the greater part of his Opening Address. Members were flocking to the Colours from town and country, from the homeland and from overseas, and at the time the Address was given some 1,362 were already serving, while 46 had already made the great sacrifice. Those days of anxiety and effort now seem far away, but the aftermath of the war is still with us, and presents problems which must be faced by every branch of our profession. Courage and determination, therefore, are still required, and I am sufficiently an optimist to believe that these national qualities of the race will enable us to meet and overcome the difficulties which still remain.

My practice, as you are aware, is chiefly that of a country land agent, charged with the management of rural estates, though on some of these great mineral wealth has been developed. My firm has been in existence for something over a century and a quarter, and I propose, from the records available on our shelves, to trace in some degree the varieties of work, apart from actual management, which has passed through our office during that period, and to show how with the passing of years new classes of work seem to spring up to take the place of those which lapse, and thus tend to keep the surveyor employed.

Before doing so, however, perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words on the agricultural position, a subject which is, no doubt, of paramount concern to every rural surveyor, but which should also be of serious interest to other classes of the community in that their prosperity or otherwise is so intimately connected with the fortunes of our chief industry.

Since the beginning of the nineteenth century we have seen four great periods of agricultural depression: The first after the Napoleonic wars, when the circumstances were doubtless somewhat similar to those prevailing to-day; the second in the "hungry 'forties," about the time of the repeal of the Corn Laws, when the extension of the franchise first placed political power in the hands of the industrialist, whose chief concern was cheap food for his employés; the third in the 'eighties and 'nineties, when new lands were being opened up and sea-transport facilities were approaching perfection; and the fourth that in whose grip we are now struggling, and the causes for which we are at present, perhaps, too near thoroughly to grasp.

It would seem probable that there are two main causes of agricultural depression, the first temporary in character, due to bad seasons, animal or crop diseases, surplus world stocks, and similar factors; the second, slower in action but perhaps more far-reaching, due to financial reactions. While as a country land agent I cannot pose as a financial expert, I am of opinion that at the present moment the industry may be suffering from both these causes.

Dealing, in the first instance, with the second of these factors, as the more obscure and possibly the more far-reaching, it is generally conceded that the point at issue is one of price—that the price received by the producer does not remunerate him for the cost of production.

It seems clear that, taking periods of sufficient duration, the price obtained for commodities, whether represented by goods or services, must depend, to a great extent, on the amount of money available with which to pay for them. I am neglecting for the moment improvements in credit and banking facilities, as they may, perhaps, be balanced against the demands of increasing trade due to the growth in the population and the opening out of the waste spaces of the world.

If money is plentiful it seems a truism to say that more will have to be paid for a given amount of a particular article. If, on the other hand, the total supply of money required for the needs of industry, trade, agriculture, government purposes, &c., is small, a larger amount of goods or services will have to be placed in the scale in order to balance or obtain the same sum of money. Theoretically, perhaps, the result in the long run should be the same, but there are ever present outside factors which militate against this, and, certainly, historical precedent seems to indicate that in practice dear money is usually associated with periods of depression. It is a generally accepted axiom that the medium adopted for currency should fluctuate in value as little as possible, and the question is now being asked whether gold, the medium used by the principal trading nations, possesses that quality; certainly marked changes in its value measured against commodities have been noticeable during the past century, and these have coincided with periods of depression and prosperity as the case may be.

The depression of the "hungry 'forties," for example, disappeared before the favouring current of prosperity ushered in by the great gold finds in Australia and California of the 'fifties, resulting not only in the marked scientific revival in farming which has been termed the "Golden Age" of agriculture, but also in the wonderful trade development of the second half of last century. As European countries changed from a silver to a gold standard in the early 'seventies, and consequently the effect of the gold finds on currency spent itself, we entered upon the renewed depression of the 'eighties and early 'nineties, only to find our difficulties again tending to disappear with the improvement in gold production from the discovery of the deep reefs of South Africa and the fields in Alaska. In the early part of the century agriculture was again definitely on the up-grade; since then, of course, much has happened likely to influence its position, but neglecting for the moment all agencies of a temporary nature, and endeavouring to peer down into the foundations of things, it seems possible that our medium of currency may be exercising an injurious effect on both agriculture and industry. This supposition appears to be borne out by the fact that the existing depression is not confined to this country nor to the agricultural industry.

Let me again say that I cannot pretend to pose as an authority on this abstruse subject. I do, however, without hesitation suggest that it is one worthy of most careful investigation by economists and statesmen, not only in our own but in other civilised countries.

In making this suggestion it must not be supposed that I fail to appreciate the parlous state in which many of our farmers find themselves to-day, and the urgent need there is for some more quickly acting remedy than currency reform. The effect of an already low level of prices has been seriously aggravated by what has probably been the worst harvest-time since the disastrous year of 1879, and it would be difficult to exaggerate the gravity of the agricultural position, particularly in the northern half of England. At the same time, while sympathising to the full with the farmer beset by so many difficulties, I cannot help expressing my regret that his representatives have taken the opportunity of launching an attack on the Prime Minister and the Government which in my opinion, and in that of many who think with me, is not justified. In view of the Government's record I think it unreasonable to assert that they have neglected agriculture and forgotten their election pledges; equally unreasonable would it be, I think, in view of the opinion expressed by the electorate in 1923, to suggest that any subsidy, duty, or bonus, which might be construed as adding to the cost of food, could be brought within the range of practical politics within the life-time of the present Parliament.

I think, however, that agriculturists have some claim on the Government owing to the passing of the Agricultural Wages Act, 1924. Few, no doubt, would be found to suggest that the skilled agricultural worker is over-paid, or, indeed, paid on a scale at all comparable with that of similarly skilled men in other occupations. Where, in my opinion, the Government have laid themselves open to criticism is that they have imposed the payment of a statutory wage—usually assessed on the cost of living and not on the productive capacity of the industry—on farmers, without affording them any guarantee that the return from their land will enable them to pay it. Indeed, they may with some reason consider themselves doubly burdened in this respect as, through the carriage of their produce, they pay a share indirectly in the statutory wages of railwaymen, as railway rates are supposed to be fixed on a scale which will maintain a reasonable profit on the railways after the wage-bill has been met. The passing of the Wages Act would, I think, justify the adoption of some remedial measures which might otherwise be looked upon as outside the scope of practical politics.

It has been said that the difficulties in which the agricultural industry finds itself to-day are economic and not political. If that is an accurate appreciation of the position, we may perhaps rule out the various political proposals for tinkering with land tenure which have been put forward in some quarters as panaceas for all rural ills. Fortunately the practical man has recognised the quacksalver, and has exhibited little interest in his nostrum.

The ground has already been so well traversed that I cannot hope to suggest anything novel, but the following avenues of investigation seem to me to afford possibilities of amelioration.

Preferential treatment for foreign produce on railways is illegal, but complaints in that respect are difficult to substantiate in view of the different conditions prevailing between through and localised traffic. It would, however, be less difficult to deal with cases which seem to afford ground for complaint if a definite rule were laid down that to charge rates for foreign produce lower in proportion to the services rendered than the corresponding rates for home produce should be looked upon as preferential treatment. The duty of investigating complaints of unfair treatment and generally of co-ordinating the charges for the carriage of home and foreign produce might reasonably be imposed on the Ministry of Agriculture.

Our milk regulations, imposed owing to considerations of public health, constitute a heavy charge on the farmer and the landowner. Imported dairy produce and skimmed milks should be subjected to careful examination and tests to insure that they comply with our own health regulations, and do not compete unfairly with our home products. The Merchandise Marks Act to some extent protects the home producer, but I am of opinion that some further protection, particularly with regard to the importation of tinned skim-milk, is needed. I am also inclined to agree that, in view of the large contribution from the agricultural industry to the Exchequer and to local rates, some proportion of the meat and dairy produce used for His Majesty's Forces and in local rate-supported institutions should be home produced.

The question of a small registration duty on imported flour is also worthy of consideration. The amount need not exceed 6*d.* per cwt., insufficient to affect the price of bread, more particularly as grain would continue to enter free. The effect, however, would be to cause bread-stuffs to be imported in the shape of grain rather than flour, our milling industry at the great ports would be stimulated, and the bran and other cereal offals needed for milk and meat production would be cheapened. At present a considerable amount of these enter from abroad, although, owing to their bulk, the carriage thereon is heavy. The advisability of prohibiting the export of offals so produced, under certain fixed prices to be determined and laid down from time to time by the Ministry of Agriculture and the Board of Trade, is also worthy of consideration.

Drainage and liming are two other matters to which too little attention has been given of late. The former is at present the subject of enquiry by a Royal Commission, but such a body takes time to prepare its report, and both drainage and liming are urgent matters if the land is to be made fully productive. I would therefore suggest that during the coming winter the Government, as they have done in the past with regard to drainage to assist unemployment, should bear a proportion of charges properly expended on these matters.

Further credit facilities have already been promised by the Government, and possibly before this Address is delivered details of their proposals may be available. I trust they will be of such a nature as to permit agriculturists to obtain temporary advances to tide them over periods of financial difficulty. Too often produce has to be sold on falling markets, mainly because cash is required for immediate commitments. Indeed, success or failure is almost wholly a question of price, and in this respect I think it is for the farmers themselves to do something to get the cart out of the rut. The Linlithgow Committee has shown where much of the loss takes place between the price paid by the consumer and that received by the producer, and I think something might and should be done by organisation to lessen this. Surely, however, this is a matter mainly for the industry itself rather than for the Government. It has recently been done in Canada, and although the conditions are different and doubtless more difficult where distribution to a home market is concerned, it should not be beyond the ability of an organised industry to set up some provisional scheme in place of the present chaos. A start might, perhaps, be made with the bacon trade, and, indeed, if that were done, the Government might be induced to follow the precedent of sugar beet and contribute something in the national as well as the agricultural interest towards establishing a new industry.

I am afraid I have dealt at greater length than I had intended with this part of my Address, but we whose work takes us on to farms, and among farmers large and small, feel much responsibility in the matter, and realise the enormous importance of finding some means of placing the industry on sounder foundations.

Turning now to a retrospect of the profession as disclosed in the records of my own firm during the past century and a half, I may be permitted to devote a few minutes to a consideration of what I may term the side lines encountered in a land agent's office, and the manner in which they change as the years roll on. How work of one sort occupies the office for a space, then disappears, and is replaced by another of entirely different character.

It is thought by many of the public that the surveying profession consists simply of measuring and making plans of land; but, as we who are in practice know, it is a very different thing, the work upon which surveyors are engaged being of endless variety. Even a solicitor not long since refused to pay my fees for negotiating a lease of land for drainage works, although his council had agreed to pay my client's solicitor and surveyor's charges. He argued in a letter to me that I had made no plans or surveys, and therefore I could make no charge. Needless to say the lease was not completed until my fees were paid. This shows the ignorance of the public as to what a surveyor's work is.

The founder of my office, directly after he finished his time as a pupil in 1808, commenced work as agent to an agricultural estate, and I find that his first side line was making a plan for an inclosure award. At that time a great many inclosures of waste land were taking place, and the plans were works of art, their lettering surrounded with oak leaves, acorns, and other semi-heraldic devices; time seemed to count for nothing in those days.

These inclosures of waste lands went on for some years, and brought a great deal of business to surveyors in making plans and setting out the allotments as divided up in the awards.

This period was succeeded by that of the railway boom, which began with the development of detached undertakings connecting some of the more important towns of the north, and which, after passing through a time of questionable schemes and fevered speculation in which fortunes were made and lost, gradually developed into the vast system administered by the four great companies of to-day. That the activities of the railway pioneers brought prosperity to our profession is reflected in the contemporary records of my firm, and my office was engaged busily for many years upon the work of surveying and setting out of the lines, negotiating sales of land either for the landowner or the company, and upon the many arbitration cases which arose in this connection.

George Hudson, a linen draper, thrice Lord Mayor of York, a Member of Parliament, commonly known as "the "Railway King," was a notable figure of the time; he had schemes for railways in all directions, some of which were successful, many collapsed; he was, however, one of the best of friends surveyors ever had. He himself, after making a huge fortune and buying several estates, and being courted by people of the highest rank, was finally overwhelmed with difficulties and ended ignominiously. His operations, however, not only provided surveyors with a great deal of employment, but have enabled myself and others from the north and other distant parts to represent our Branches on the Council of The Institution, for without our railways we could not come up to London as easily as we do. Before the railways it took 3 days to get from York to London, now it takes 3¾ hours.

It is said that the art of dining is widely practised among surveyors, although no reference is made to it in our Charter as one of the objects which The Institution was founded to promote. Few decades, at any rate, of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries remain undistinguished by the establishment of one or more professional dining clubs, and I am inclined to think that Hudson recognised this human weakness and played upon it so as to lubricate the passage of his schemes.

I have in my possession a menu of a banquet given by him when he was Lord Mayor of York in 1846. The following is a summary of it:—

Boiled Rounds of Beef.
Roasted Swan.

Soups.
4 kinds.
Fish.
9 kinds.
Entrées.
7 kinds.
Releves.
12 kinds.
Game.
7 kinds.
Jellies.

Creams.
5 kinds.
Salads.
4 kinds.
Pastry.
4 kinds, &c.
Dessert.
7 kinds, &c., &c.

Roasted Loins of Beef, &c.

There is no mention of wines, but I presume they were on an equally generous scale.

Going back now to the office, I have come across numerous letters complaining of the terrible state of agriculture in the 'forties and of the depression that then existed. The remedy for the industrial depression then seemed to be the repeal of the Corn Laws, which was carried through in 1846; but in spite of this removal of protection agriculture seemed to get on its legs again, and trade generally became prosperous throughout the country. During this period a large number of valuations for the revision of rents were made, and I also find the office was engaged in making valuations and maps of parishes for the overseers for rating purposes. This was before the passing of the Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862.

About this time, in 1861, the Ordnance Survey of the country to a scale of $\frac{1}{2500}$ of nature was begun by the Government, and gradually as this has been completed and continued the land survey of estates by private practitioners has grown less and less, and one source of income to the surveyor has disappeared.

The valuation of agricultural property for mortgages was one that occupied the office very fully up to within a few years ago, but owing to the feeling of insecurity in land and the passing of Acts allowing trustees to invest in a variety of other securities, it is difficult now to get advances on agricultural land except at a high rate of interest, and valuations for mortgage are consequently few and far between. At one time, especially when so many sewage schemes and waterworks schemes were being initiated, arbitration cases were continuous, and it is astonishing in these days to see how many witnesses were required on both sides and how costs mounted up. Now, however, owing to the appointment of official arbitrators, these cases have become much more simple affairs and costs are cut down, the private arbitrator's work being almost abolished.

In 1858 machinery was established by the Ecclesiastical Leasing Act of that year for the sale of glebe lands through the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and in 1888 an alternative method with the sanction of the Land Commissioners (now the Ministry of Agriculture) was provided by the Glebe Lands Act, 1888. Under these powers a very large quantity of land has been sold. Under the Ecclesiastical Leasing Act a surveyor is generally appointed by the incumbent, and his report goes to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Under the Glebe Lands Act the Minister of Agriculture appoints the valuer to fix the price at which a sale can be approved. Very many cases under these two statutes passed through my office, especially during the boom following the Great War.

Next we come to the Finance Act, 1910, and the assessment of the country under a variety of values which gave work not only to the agents of estates, but also to many of our members who received appointments in the Valuation Department, and to the surveyors on the Panel of Referees appointed to hear appeals. This was all wiped out in 1920 except so far as estate or death duties are concerned, in respect of which the Panel of Referees still exists to hear appeals against the assessments of the Inland Revenue.

During and after the Great War surveyors were employed in assessing compensation for damage done by the troops and the enemy, as well as that to be paid for losses through crops being taken over by the Government and under the Corn Production Act.

Now, as a last side line, under the Tithe Act of 1925, land agents are being employed by the Queen Anne's Bounty office in the collection of tithe, and as in many cases the tithe in the past has been collected in a somewhat haphazard manner, with no up-to-date registers kept of changes in ownership or divisions on sales, those who have the work in hand must experience no little difficulty in getting the collection placed on a satisfactory footing.

I think it will be seen from what I have said that the side lines of a land agent's work over a long period have been of a very varied description and subject to continual change with the passage of time.

A matter that will, I am sure, appeal generally to country land agents is the spoliation of the country-side, the unfortunate modern tendency of which, I hope, he will do all he can to check. There is no doubt whatever that much of the loveliness of rural England is being ruined. Owing to the high cost of road-making, people who build houses and bungalows naturally go where they can build without incurring the expense of road charges, and so it happens that along our country roads and lanes houses and bungalows are breaking like a rash upon the face of what once was a lovely country-side. The buildings are frequently of an ugly style of architecture and out of harmony with the surroundings. Ornamental timber is cut down, ferro-concrete bridges, often of hideous design, span the streams, and petrol stations with their pumps of many colours spring up here, there and everywhere without thought as to whether their garish appearance and the noise created by their customers is not ruining the charm of our once quiet villages. All art and beauty seem, in fact, to be giving place to a devouring utilitarianism. Surely with a little thought these things need not be. We shall all wish God-speed to the Council for the Preservation of Rural England, which was started with the object of preserving the natural beauties of our country.

I am glad to find that some of our towns and cities are inserting clauses in their General Powers Bills by which an advisory committee consisting of a member of the town council, a nominee of the Royal Institute of British Architects and a nominee of The Surveyors' Institution will advise on the elevations of new buildings. This seems a move in the right direction, and should do something to extend to urban areas the movement initiated by the Council for the Preservation of Rural England.

Doubtless the extension of town planning, in rural as well as in urban districts, will also tend to check undesirable development. I am able, in Tables V., VI. and VII. to give up-to-date statistics supplied by the Ministry of Health, which indicate the importance and extent of this movement, a movement which must inevitably in the future affect more and more intimately the work of every surveyor in general practice, and which, therefore, I would suggest calls for their close attention and co-operation.

The general recognition of the necessity for co-ordination between neighbouring authorities has led to the formation of a number of Regional Committees, particularly in the neighbourhood of our great centres of population, and although the functions of these Committees are mainly advisory, one effect of their formation is to stimulate public interest in town planning and extend the areas to which it is being applied. The sporadic development of a ribbon-like form along the lines of traffic routes in our rural districts —a subject to which I have already referred—will doubtless be checked or at least controlled by town planning schemes initiated by these Committees. The extent to which the movement has spread since the original Act was passed in 1909 is demonstrated by the figures, which show that there were 601 schemes proposed or in operation on 30th September last comprising 3,057,647 acres.

Obviously town planning has become the recognised policy for the future development of our country, but the subject of planning rural areas in particular opens out important and difficult problems, and it is, I venture to suggest, for members of The Institution to see that the interests of the community and of their clients are served in solving these problems. With proper forethought and mutual consideration, there seems no reason why these separate interests should not be brought into harmony.

There are other problems which confront the urban surveyor and his client to which as President I may be expected to refer. Of these perhaps one of the most urgent is the basis upon which compensation for land acquired under compulsory powers in an unhealthy area should be calculated and paid. This, as everyone in this room must know, is now regulated by Section 46 of the Housing Act, 1925.

Two years ago, and upon this very occasion, my predecessor, Mr. J. D. Wallis, discussed in some detail, and with great ability, the unfairness and hardship which individual owners of property have suffered by the operation of this now notorious section. Were it not that his arguments and conclusions have been fully justified, and to such an extent that local authorities are now unwilling to enforce their powers under the section—and that this section, in spite of universal condemnation, remains still unrepealed—I should hesitate to add to the words of one who, having resigned the appointment of official arbitrator in order to assume this Chair, could speak with unrivalled authority upon the subject. The question of compensation for land taken in unhealthy areas is one which, as the Final Report of the Departmental Committee on Unhealthy Areas points out, has puzzled administrators for many years. The Report outlines the history of legislation upon the subject during the past 35 years, and in view of its interest to-day I may be permitted perhaps briefly to refer to it.

Prior to 1919 compensation in respect of unhealthy areas acquired by local authorities for reconstruction was assessed upon the basis of fair market value of the land and buildings upon it, regard being had to the nature and condition of the property, the state of repair of the buildings, and the probable duration of the structures in that state of repair. If the houses or premises were unfit and incapable of being made fit for human occupation, the owner could only obtain the value of the site plus the cost of the building material, and nothing for the building as such.

Upon the face of it this arrangement would appear to be one which was both equitable to the owner and reasonable so far as the local authority was concerned. In practice, however, it was found that the method of assessing the compensation was costly to the acquiring authority. The basis of assessment was not the value of the land for the purposes for which it was usually acquired by the authority, namely, housing, but was calculated according to the possibilities of the site for industrial or commercial development. Moreover, in some cases compensation had to be paid for the buildings, even though they would have to be pulled down to carry out the scheme of improvement. These difficulties in practice did much to hinder local authorities from dealing with areas which, in the interests of sanitation and public health, it was urgently necessary to reconstruct.

Section 9 of the Housing and Town Planning Act, 1919, was passed in order to remedy the difficulty, and introduced new principles of assessing compensation. These were, firstly, that compensation should be limited to the market value of the cleared site; and, secondly, that such market value was to be reduced according to the manner in which the acquiring authority subsequently used the land. The object of these two principles when combined was, at any rate in theory, to remove the burdens which had fallen upon the acquiring authorities and the resulting loss to ratepayers. In 1925 this section was re-enacted as Section 46 of the Housing Act of that year.

The hardship and injustice which this section has caused to individuals whose property has been coloured red under a reconstruction scheme, although either in perfectly sound and tenantable repair or capable of being made so, are now too well known to need prolonged discussion by me. The pendulum of unreasonableness has swung the other way, and the burden has been shifted from the ratepayers' shoulders to those of a particular class of the community—the owners of small-class property, men and women frequently of slender means.

The Unhealthy Areas Committee, of which the present Minister of Health was chairman, reported finally in April, 1921, and emphatically condemned the principles of compensation now enunciated in Section 46. "Its drastic pro" visions," the Report states, " are considered likely to lead
" to such inequality and injustice between individuals as to " encounter violent opposition. Owing to the inequity of " paying nothing for buildings, which in themselves might " be unexceptional, but which happen to be in an unhealthy
" area, it is suggested that the local authority will be " deterred from representing areas as unhealthy. Moreover,
" the task of the local authority and the Minister of Health,
" in deciding upon the use to which the land shall be put in
" the future, will be rendered extremely difficult by the fact
" that upon that use will depend the compensation payable
" to the owner."

These statements were made six and a half years ago in the Report of a strong Departmental Committee which recommended that compensation should be based, not as laid down in Section 46, but upon the assumption that the present user of any buildings on the site will be stabilised for an arbitrary period of ten years, a recommendation which might, in practice, have proved a reasonable compromise. It received the approval, in principle, of the Association of Municipal Corporations, a body whose opinions are not open to the criticism that they are likely to be unduly favourable to the property-owner.

In November, 1923, The Institution urged upon the Minister of Health that, until remedial legislation was enacted, local authorities should be required to differentiate between premises actually unfit for habitation and those in a reasonable state of repair, although situated in an unhealthy area.

Nevertheless, in 1925, when the legislation on housing and town planning was separated under the two Acts of that year, Section 9 of the 1919 Act was re-enacted as Section 46 of the Housing Act, 1925. Again, in December, 1925, the Council presented to the Minister a Memorandum upon the operation of the section. It was published in the Journal for January, 1926, and recommended that the reduction factor should be eliminated, and the land paid for at its value as ascertained under the Acquisition of Land Act, 1919; that property not in itself insanitary, but included in a reconstruction scheme, should be treated on the same basis as property acquired for road widening or public improvements under the Acquisition of Land Act, 1919; that where it was uncertain whether property should be treated as insanitary in itself or not, the official arbitrator should have power to award compensation in excess of the site value, but less than that awarded for property recognised as being sanitary; and that compensation should also be given for disturbance of business and for the cost of removal of plant and machinery.

These views have been since urged upon the Minister by interview and by letter, and Mr. Chamberlain has on several occasions, notably at the Annual Dinner of The Institution in March last, declared his intention of introducing amending legislation. This he subsequently repeated in the course of the debate last Session on the Second Reading of the Liverpool Bill, Clause 94 of which directly repudiated the principles laid down by Section 46. In spite, nevertheless, of its admitted injustice and of condemnation by those with power to enforce it, as well as by bodies of impartial persons with experience of its operation, the section remains in force. Mr. Chamberlain, however, has shown that he recognises its unfairness, and we must hope that this fact, combined with his promises of an amending measure, will result, in spite of the congestion of the Parliamentary calendar, in the early disappearance of the section from the Statute Book. The Council of The Institution, at any rate, will continue their endeavour to secure that end.

Table IV. in the Appendix to this Address gives statistics as to the number of houses dealt with in improvement and reconstruction schemes since 1919.

Apart from the effect upon local authorities of Section 46 —to which I have already referred—activity in this class of work must be influenced in varying degrees by other factors, such as the lack of the cheaper type of accommodation required for the dispossessed tenants, the economic difficulty of providing dwellings at rents within the means of the probable occupiers, the cost of rehabilitating existing buildings, and the inevitable problem associated with the slum dweller as a tenant.

This subject would seem appropriately to lead up to that of housing, and I think we should all like to congratulate the Minister of Health and his Department on the result of their campaign to meet the housing shortage which has accumulated since 1910, and more particularly during the years of war. Through the courtesy of the Ministry of Health I am able to give in the Appendix the latest available figures. They show that the million mark which was aimed at this autumn has been more than reached. The reduced scale of subsidy (£4, £7 10*s*., and £11 per annum, in place of £6, £9, and £12 10*s*. respectively for the three classes of qualified houses) operates in respect of houses commenced after or not completed by 1st October last. Table III. shows the cost of parlour and non-parlour houses quarterly since June, 1924, and although it is perhaps still early to judge, there would appear to be ground for thinking that the Minister's anticipations that the reduction in the subsidy would not increase the cost may prove well-founded.

I should like to acknowledge my indebtedness to our own member, Mr. A. Elliott Terry, the Valuer to the Ministry of Health, as well as to the Department for the statistics I am able to include in the Appendix.

I must not depart from the subject of housing without reminding you that the problem is one which affects rural as well as urban areas. The Minister of Health has added to his other housing achievements that of the passing of the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, a most useful measure which is designed to facilitate the improvement of conditions under which agricultural labourers and other country workers live. Under this Act assistance may be provided from public funds towards the reconditioning and modernisation of old cottages and the conversion into dwellings of buildings previously used for other purposes. Its administration falls upon local authorities and its advantages are already being recognised, though the Act has been in operation for ten months. Up to last August some 40 county councils and 4 urban district councils had formulated proposals for the Minister's approval, covering some 2,600 dwellings, and showing the method in which the Act was to be applied in their areas. Articles dealing in detail with the provisions of this measure have already appeared in the Journal, and I commend it for the consideration of my fellow land agents and of any agricultural landowner desirous of improving both the value of his property and the conditions of those living on his estate.

The Landlord and Tenant (No. 2) Bill has now emerged, with considerable amendments, from the Report stage, and may be expected to receive the Royal Assent during the next few weeks in substantially its present form. Whether this measure will prove advantageous or otherwise in practice must depend almost wholly upon the manner in which the statutory tribunal exercises its judicial functions. There is not, I think, any reason to suppose that the panel of competent persons, from which the Reference Committee will appoint an arbitrator as each question between lessor and lessee arises, will act otherwise than with knowledge, discretion, and common-sense. That being so, there is every ground for hope that the apprehension expressed in some quarters concerning the effect of the Act on values may prove unfounded, while the criticism which has been directed against the leasehold system in respect of faults acknowledged to have existed in the past has been largely met by the changes in the law of landlord and tenant that are now proposed.

Of the direction of these changes most of you are by now aware.

The main provisions of the measure deal with improvements, payment for good-will, and the right, in certain circumstances, to ask for a renewal of a lease. These provisions will only affect property used for business purposes.

As regards proposed improvements the absolute power of veto which could formerly be exercised by a lessor will now be modified; the lessee will be able to ask the tribunal to decide whether his proposals for altering the premises are likely to add to their letting value, and should, in consequence, be carried out. The tribunal—in other words, the competent individual selected from a panel by the Reference Committee to deal with the case—will be empowered to make a decision after hearing all the facts. Should he decide in favour of the improvement, the lessor may carry it out and charge a reasonable increase in rent; on the other hand, an approved improvement, if executed by a lessee, will carry with it a right to claim compensation for it when the tenancy ends. To claim compensation, be it noted, but not necessarily to receive it, for the latter will depend upon whether the letting value of the premises at the termination of the tenancy has been increased by virtue of the improvement. The principle adopted is that if the lessor derives a financial benefit from some act of the lessee, he should pay compensation equivalent to the advantage he has received, but not more than the reasonable cost of carrying out the improvement.

Good-will which has become attached to business premises will be compensatable under the Act where a renewal of the lease is not granted and the lessor is shown to derive pecuniary advantage from the fact that the outgoing lessee has carried on a particular business on the premises. The amount of compensation will be calculated according to the difference between the rent obtainable for the premises in the open market and that attributable to the energy and business acumen of the lessee while in occupation. How much that is to be, it will be the duty of the tribunal to decide. All the circumstances of each case will be disclosed—for example, any intended change of user, demolition, or reconstruction—and the pecuniary benefit, if any, which will be enjoyed by the lessor as a result of the lessee's occupation, will then be determined.

In practice, however, it may not prove easy, unless the new tenant carries on a similar trade to that of the outgoer, and is willing to pay something more than market rent in the belief that he will capture a portion of his predecessor's good-will, to substantiate a claim under this provision of the Act.

Where an outgoing lessee considers that his losses on removal would not be met by this compensation, he may claim a renewal of his lease, and, failing agreement with the lessor, may refer this matter also to the tribunal. As a complete justification for the refusal of such a claim, the lessor may plead inter alia a definite intention to occupy the premises himself, or that he requires them for demolition and remodelling, or for a scheme of re-development. Apart from this it will be left to the tribunal to decide whether the grant of a new tenancy (which may be for a term up to 14 years) is, in all circumstances, reasonable. This provision, however, does not give the lessee any definite right of renewal, which will only be granted by the tribunal after hearing the arguments of the parties and if the circumstances of each case appear to justify it.

I repeat, then, that the practical advantages and smooth working of this measure must depend almost entirely upon the manner in which the tribunal exercises its judicial functions. As for that, I myself am no pessimist when I remember that my successors in this Chair will all be members of the Committee by whom the panel of competent, experienced and responsible men will be selected. Should the duty of assisting in the selection of these men fall upon me before my term of office expires, you may rest assured that the sources of help and advice with which I am surrounded will not be left unused. There is, therefore, some ground for optimism that the changes now to be made in the law of landlord and tenant, as to which so many apprehensions in responsible quarters have been expressed, may ultimately prove to be an aid to good estate management and a valuable means of avoiding disputes between lessors and lessees.

There is little I need say with regard to the domestic affairs of The Institution. We are just approaching our Diamond Jubilee, and a retrospect of the sixty years which have passed can only, I think, give rise to a feeling of satisfaction at a fine record of good work done. My predecessors in this Chair and their colleagues on the Council and on the Standing Committees, and the Executives of the County Branches, have established a tradition of unselfish service which augurs well for the future of our body, and leads one to believe that when another sixty years shall have passed away the position which The Institution has made for itself to-day will be found still further strengthened and advanced.

As a late chairman of the Education Committee I may be permitted to say a few words on the subject of our professional education. It is now nearly 50 years since the system of entrance by examination was established, and during that time something like 18,000 candidates have submitted themselves for the professional examinations, Intermediate and Final, or Direct Fellowship. Doubtless the tendency is for all such examinations to become more severe, even without conscious volition on the part of those responsible for them. The Council, however, have been somewhat concerned at the reduction in the percentage of passes since the war; previously they were about 66 per cent., now they approximate more nearly to 55 per cent.

This circumstance together with the reports received annually from the examiners in the different subjects has given rise to some doubt in the minds of the Council whether the general standard of education of those about to enter the profession is sufficient to enable them thoroughly to grasp the principles of their future work. To remedy this, future candidates will be required either to have passed the Preliminary or an exempting examination, or, if over 25, a special test of general education in its place. The Council are also considering whether some reorganisation of the professional examinations may not be desirable to insure that candidates have a fair acquaintance with the basic principles upon which their technical knowledge should rest, before presenting themselves for examination in the distinctly professional subjects.

In making this statement I do not wish it to be supposed that the standard of attainment among the candidates for The Institution examinations is low. Indeed the contrary is the case, and, in my opinion, a comparision of the qualifications of the candidate of to-day against those of his predecessors in the early days of our system would show how much has been done by our examination system to raise the standard of knowledge and attainment throughout the profession. No, any reorganisation of the examinations, if found desirable, will be adopted merely with the object of helping the student of the future more readily to apply his theoretical knowledge to the practical questions which will arise during the course of his professional career. I have no doubts in my mind as to both the capacity and the ability of the present generation, nor as to their being fully capable of maintaining the reputation of the designation "Chartered "Surveyor."

(a) Including particulars of a scheme which is partly a pre-war scheme.

The total area in England and Wales included in 572 town planning schemes, proposed or in operation at the 31st March, 1927, was 2,751,801 acres.

This area has since that date and up to 30th September, 1927, been increased by 39 schemes, comprising an area of 305,846 acres. The total area has been thereby increased in the 611 schemes to an area of 3,057,647 acres.

The difference between the totals of the acreage and percentages indicated in Tables VI. and VII. is due to the fact that density standards are sometimes not fixed for business and industrial zones where housing development is not expected.

Mr. C. B. Fisher, c.b.e. (Senior Vice-President), in proposing a very hearty vote of thanks to the President for his excellent and wise Address, said he had no doubt it would be handed down in the archives of The Institution from generation to generation in the same way as the Addresses of previous Presidents. He need hardly refer in that connection to the very able Address given by Mr. Watney the previous year on questions arising out of the development of London, which aroused so much interest. The present Address, while giving principally the agricultural point of view, dealt also with the general activities of The Institution. It was not permissible on the present occasion to criticise the President's remarks, and personally he could not do so if he would and would not if he could. The present was not the first step the President had taken to signalise his year of office; at Harrogate he and the Committee of Yorkshire members were responsible for the excellent arrangements made for the meeting held there. The grateful thanks of the members were due on that account, not only to the President but to the Yorkshire Committee, and to Mr. Douglas its Chairman. It was true that the menu referred to by the President as having been given by the Lord Mayor of York at an entertainment in 1846 was not provided, but it must be remembered the meeting was held at Harrogate, which was a health resort and a place not, perhaps, so interested in menus as York.

At the Harrogate meeting the President was able to announce that Lord Lascelles had accepted the position of Honorary Member of The Institution. Lord Lascelles, like the President, dwelt upon the question of agricultural depression. That was not a question which affected agriculturists only; it concerned all classes of the population of this country, and had its effect on industry and trade. He was glad that in that connection the President had touched on the questions of monetary instability and the gold standard. That was a very complex subject, and he would be a bold man who would be prepared to say definitely that the gold standard had had an effect on agricultural depression; but the Agricultural Committee of The Institution were considering the matter, and were in agreement with the President that it might possibly be one of the primary causes of the depression in agriculture and the depression in trade. In view of the illustrations used by the President to show how at different periods agriculture had been affected by the rise or fall of gold values, the question seemed worthy of consideration not only by economists and bankers and financial experts, but by everyone who had any inclination to consider economic problems.

The Agricultural Committee and the President had been greatly impressed by the Report of the Committee on the Stabilisation of Agricultural Prices, published in 1925—comparatively up to date. That Committee was appointed by the Minister of Agriculture and had looked at the question from the agricultural point of view. He thought the Minister of Agriculture had acted wisely in appointing that Committee, and members would find it interesting to read its Report and see if they could arrive at any conclusions as a result of the information collected and there set out.

Consideration of the matter, however, showed that there was one very simple point which should always be borne in mind. Gold was the standard in this country, and the only legal form of tender for purchasing and selling at the present time in this and many other countries was gold. To reduce the problem to its simplest proportions, if gold remained the standard and the sovereign was the only form in which that gold was issued, and only one sovereign was issued, then with that sovereign one could buy the whole world; but if nine other people had nine other sovereigns, one could only buy one-tenth of the produce of the world, and being in competition commodities would become dearer. He did not wish to go into the subject in more detail than that, but put it forward for consideration because it was one in which all should take an interest. It was to be hoped, as the Agricultural Committee urged, that the Government would follow the recommendation of the Genoa Conference, and call an international conference to discuss the matter.

The President alluded also to other agricultural problems. In all these agriculture seemed to be at a disadvantage, since the scales were always weighted against the producer. If the Government were asked to do something for agriculture the reply was "That is impossible, because the consumers have "the majority of the votes." As an agriculturist he would like to see consumers and producers brought into closer contact. The whole question should be removed from the atmosphere of politics, and consumers and producers brought round a table to discuss the matter, with the idea that many things which were good for one were also good for the other.

At the recent meeting of the Agricultural Council he tabled a resolution suggesting that the Food Council which was established about two years ago should be reorganised, and that the Minister of Agriculture should have the power to appoint six representatives of the producers and the Board of Trade, the other six as representatives of the consumers. At the present time there were twelve representatives, but only one of them had any practical knowledge of agriculture. That resolution was carried by the Agricultural Council and would be supported by the House of Commons Agricultural Committee, of which one of the members of the Council of The Institution, Sir George Courthope, was chairman, as well as by Sir Charles Howell Thomas, who was at one time on the Council, but who had resigned from it on taking up the important post of Permanent Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, and whom all the members were very glad to see present that evening.

The President had referred to various Acts of Parliament, and it would appear from the references he had made to various subjects that all the problems connected with the life and welfare of the community came from time to time within the purview of the members of The Institution. The number of questions in which the members of The Institution were interested, both personally and practically, was enormous, and in view of the number of duties which devolved on surveyors, it was important for them to bear that in mind, not only from the point of view of earning money for themselves and their families, but with a view to working for the good of the country as a whole. He was sure the members would be grateful to the President for the reference he had made to the various Acts of Parliament, for those Acts were of paramount importance, not only to surveyors but to the public generally.

Many years ago, when he was at Brasenose, he rowed in what were called the Cox Challenge Fours, for a challenge cup presumably given by a Mr. Cox. He now found himself rowing, with three other Vice-Presidents, in a four with Mr. Cox. He was sure the Vice-Presidents would do all they could to support their stroke, and, ably coached as they would be by the Secretary of The Institution, and with the assistance of all its members, he was confident that Mr. Cox would go through his year of office with satisfaction, not only to himself but to all the members of The Institution.

He had very great pleasure in proposing a hearty vote of thanks to the President.

Mr. C. H. Gott (Member of Council), in seconding the resolution, said it was one which he was sure all the members would endorse without further words of commendation, but he welcomed the opportunity afforded him in seconding the motion to congratulate an old colleague with whom he had been actively associated in the work of The Institution in his native county ever since the days when Provincial Committees—as they were originally called—were founded, over thirty years ago. Mr. Cox had always kept the flag of The Institution flying in the north of England, where he was held in high esteem, and the Address he had delivered that evening gave the assurance that he would be equally successful in the wider sphere his present office opened to him.

Personally he looked on the Presidential Address as a sort of King's Speech, in which the Government of the day brought to the notice of the members a number of the more important topics which would engage the attention of The Institution and the profession during the coming year. The President had referred to a number of subjects which it would be tempting to deal with, but in the presence of such giants among agricultural experts as Mr. Fisher and the permanent head of the Ministry of Agriculture, he did not propose to touch upon the agricultural industry. There were, however, one or two matters to which he wished briefly to refer.

No Address at the present time could be considered really complete, perhaps, unless it included some mention of the famous Section 46. He would not enter into the question of the merits or demerits of the principle of that section, but it was clear from what the President said that if, as he suggested, the present basis of compensation on the acquisition of property for slum clearance was to be abandoned, and a return was to be made to that of pre-1919 days, however desirable that might be, the cost to the community of any extensive programme of slum clearance throughout the country would be more than the community could bear. He wondered, therefore, whether the solution would not have to be sought along less heroic lines, by schemes of partial reconditioning and something short of total demolition, perhaps on the lines of some scheme, compulsory or otherwise, of co-operation, a pooling of all the interests in the area concerned, with the sacrifice, perhaps, of some properties only and the re-conditioning of others on a co-operative basis. Some different method from that hitherto followed might have to be sought.

The President had referred to the progress made in town planning since the necessary powers had been in force, and had mentioned that some 601 schemes had already been evolved. That was very interesting, but it was, perhaps, of equal interest to note that only 23 of those schemes (allowing for amending schemes) had now, after 17 years, reached the stage where the proposals were definite and final. Some of the schemes, moreover, were quite small ones. He could not help feeling that, although the landowner might be willing to put himself under limitations for the benefit of the community, he must hope that, at any rate within some reasonable period, he would know definitely what those limitations were and what were his powers and obligations.

He wished briefly to refer to the Landlord and Tenant

Bill, which, he supposed, one could assume would very shortly become an Act. He held no brief for the Bill, although it had fallen to him to take a very modest part in framing it; but he was very glad to hear the President greet it in a spirit of optimism. After sitting through many of the debates in Committee, he had been impressed by the earnest endeavour shown to hammer out a measure which would be fair to all interests, and he thought it might be agreed that the Bill in its present form, although cumbrous and complicated, could not be described as inequitable. The President thought its success would depend on the functioning of the tribunal; personally he thought it would really depend on the surveyor's profession and the spirit with which they dealt with the problems which arose in their daily meetings and between their clients. With a code before them, setting out the respective rights of the lessor and the lessee, he imagined that in the great majority of cases some sort of mutual arrangement would be come to which would be for the benefit of both sides, without the matter ever becoming a dispute which had to be submitted to the tribunal.

The only other topic on which he wished to speak was one which interested him very deeply, namely the education of the future generation of surveyors. He agreed with the President that the time had now arrived when the examination scheme of The Institution should be reviewed, to ensure that it provided properly for a sound knowledge of the basic principles upon which the practice of surveyors was founded. It was not sufficient nowadays in any branch of the profession to know how to solve a given problem; it was necessary to appreciate why it must be solved in such and such a way, and to know the laws—economic and natural—on which their work was based. The Education Committee, over which he had the honour to preside, had already taken the subject up and were giving it their earnest consideration, and he hoped the result of their deliberations and those of the Council would be to insure that future Fellows of the Institution would have received a sound training which fitted them to join the profession.

He had great pleasure in seconding the motion so ably moved by Mr. Fisher.

Mr. C. B. Fisher then put the resolution, which was carried unanimously with acclamation.

The President said he was very grateful to Mr. Fisher, Mr. Gott and all those present for the kind way in which they had received his Address. It was very difficult for a President to choose an appropriate subject for his Address; it was, perhaps, the most difficult duty he had to perform during his term of office. If his remarks had been interesting, he was more than satisfied.

PAPER NO. 509.

THE ROYAL AND MEDIÆVAL TOMBS IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

By Lawrence E. Tanner, M.A., F.S.A.
(Assistant-Keeper of Muniments, Westminster Abbey).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 5th December, 1927.

When your Council did me the honour of inviting me on a previous occasion to read a Paper before The Institution I took as my subject "The Building of the "Abbey Church of Westminster."* I tried to show that the Abbey as we know it to-day is the outcome of a deliberate attempt to realise a great ideal—that is to say, that for over 600 years the architects, the monks and benefactors of the Abbey built and rebuilt and added to the fabric until there arose a mighty church dedicated to the glory of God, and containing the most perfect work which the mind and hand of mediæval man could possibly produce. I pointed out, too, that these architects believed in their work, they were not afraid to destroy and pull down what we should now regard as beautiful in itself if it seemed to them, from a practical or æsthetic point of view, inadequate or unworthy of the great ideal which they had in view.

On that occasion I spoke of the fabric, but to-night I propose to go a step further and examine some of the beautiful things which the Abbey contains and more particularly "The Royal and Mediæval Tombs."

Of these the most important is, of course, the great shrine of Edward the Confessor. It was made, as the inscription tells us, in 1268, by Peter, a Roman of the Cosmati family, at the command of Henry III. In that year the body of the Confessor was solemnly translated from its original resting-place in front of the high altar and placed in this shrine by the King himself. With the solitary exception of the very interesting little shrine of St. Candida in the village church of Whitechurch Canonicorum, in Dorset, it is the only shrine in England which survived the Reformation almost untouched and still contains the body of its saint.

* See Journal, Vol. IV., Part 7.

The shrine itself is of purbeck marble, and was once covered with glass mosaics of which a few fragments still remain. At one end stood two twisted pillars supporting figures of the Confessor and the Pilgrim. These pillars have been displaced, and now, half-buried, support the reredos slab at the back of the altar. The top, or feretory, was of gold, but this disappeared at the dissolution of the monastery in 1540, and the existing wooden top (perhaps a copy of the original) was made by Abbot Feckenham during the short-lived revival of the monastery under Mary Tudor. The coffin rests in a recess above the niches on either side of the shrine, thereby enabling those who came to pray and be healed of their diseases to kneel right underneath it. It was while praying at the shrine that King Henry IV. had a stroke, and was carried by the terrified monks to the Jerusalem Chamber near by, thus fulfilling the prophecy that he would die at Jerusalem. The scene has, of course, been immortalised by Shakespeare. There is a further curious point to notice about the shrine. On each side, immediately under the cornice and opposite to each other, are removable blocks of stone, and there seems little reason to doubt that these were deliberately made to enable objects to be passed from one side of the shrine to the other. These would touch the head of the coffin as they passed and thereby acquire peculiar sanctity.

It is difficult for us to imagine the magnificence and beauty of this shrine in its original state. Until the 15th century there would seem to have been no altar screen to hide it from any portion of the church, and the high altar, with the great gleaming shrine behind it, must have dominated the great church which Henry had built to the glory of God and in memory of the saintly King. It is not surprising that Westminster, Canterbury and Walsingham were the centres of pilgrimage in mediæval England, and that treasures and relics innumerable were lavished upon the Abbey shrine. The relic chest stood on the north side of the shrine, and we have several lists of the treasures which it contained. Among the Abbey muniments is an indulgence which mentions those held in special honour. They were a portion of the Holy Blood, the girdle of the Virgin Mary, the imprint of our Lord's foot at the Ascension, and the ring given to the Confessor by St. John. With regard to the first of these, we know that it was sent to Henry III. by the Patriarch of Jerusalem in 1247. Henry himself bore it barefoot from St. Paul's to Westminster, and it was "the joyful surprise" which greeted those who were assembled in the Abbey to witness the knighting of his half-brother William of Valence. There is, I think, little doubt that a curious little niche 6 inches high, which exists in the pillar just above Henry's own tomb, must once have contained the "crystal vase" which held this sacred relic.

The tomb of Henry III. occupies the middle bay on the north side of the Confessor's Chapel. It was designed by Peter the Roman, whom we have seen designed the shrine, and dates from about 1291. Like the shrine it is composed of purbeck marble and mosaic work, and slabs of porphyry. On the north side much of the mosaic remains, and from one of the side chapels it is possible to get a very fair idea of a mediæval tomb in all its splendour. Seen from this spot the tomb is some 12 or more feet high, but it will be noticed that up to a point roughly corresponding with the reach of a man's arm the mosaic has entirely disappeared. It is easy to talk of vandalism, but no doubt bits of mosaic were cherished as sacred mementoes, and we must not, perhaps, think too hardly of those who thus despoiled the tomb. More disreputable was the "John Bylson of Hull," who scribbled his name on the tomb in the 15th century. The gilt bronze effigy of the King is by William Torel. The face of the King is most interesting and remarkable, and, although conventionalised, would seem to aim at being an actual portrait. The lower portion of the tomb on the south side contains three open recesses, in which were originally placed some of the relics.

Almost exactly contemporary with Henry III.'s tomb is that of his daughter-in-law, Eleanor of Castile, the wife of Edward I. Few queens have been more beloved. Everyone knows the story of how she sucked the poison from her husband's wound, and how, when she died, Edward caused twelve great stone crosses to be erected to commemorate the stages of her funeral from Nottinghamshire to Westminster. Three of these still remain at Geddington, Northampton, and Waltham, but the most famous of all—Charing Cross—has been entirely rebuilt. The village of Charing was probably of Saxon origin, and the name is found long before the 13th century, but the charming and romantic derivation of the word from "la chère reine," however fanciful, at least shows the affection in which the Queen was held. The gilt bronze effigy by William Torel is, perhaps, the loveliest thing in the Abbey, and looking at it it is not difficult to believe the words of a contemporary that in her "strife ever found a "peacemaker, the oppressed protection, and the distressed "sympathy." Edward was inconsolable at her loss, and he made large gifts to the Abbey which enabled masses to be said for her soul, and candles to be kept continuously burning before the tomb for nearly 250 years. On the ambulatory side there are traces of a painting by Walter of Durham on the stonework, depicting a tomb with mourners and Edward himself kneeling in prayer to the Virgin Mary. Above is a beautiful wrought-iron screen, made by Thomas of Leighton Buzzard. This in course of time was removed, but was found and replaced in its original position by Sir Gilbert Scott.

In striking contrast to these three wonderful tombs is the perfectly plain slab of black purbeck marble, resting on a base of Caen stone, which marks the resting place of Edward I. Its great size—for it is over 9 feet long—and the complete absence of decoration make it singularly impressive and no unworthy memorial of one who was essentially a man of action. It has been suggested that the tomb was left thus in accordance with the dying wish of the King that his bones should not be buried until Scotland was finally subdued, but more probably it was left unfinished by Edward's faithless and thriftless son. When the tomb was opened in 1774 the King's body was found to be perfectly preserved and to measure over 6 feet in length. It has been repeatedly stated that when this examination was concluded the coffin and its contents were embedded in pitch to prevent future desecration. There appears, however, to be no foundation for this story, and that "on the contrary all "things were suffered to remain in the same condition, "situation and place wherein they were found."

To Edward we owe the link which binds the living to the dead. The Coronation Chair, in which every sovereign has been crowned since Edward II., was made in 1300-1301 to enclose the Stone of Scone. The Chair, which is of oak, and cost £5 in those days, was elaborately painted by Master Walter, the king's painter, but little of his work now remains. It is only within the last hundred years or so that it has been properly treated; before then any might sit in it who would. The back is covered with names—many, I am afraid, of 18th-century Westminster boys—and the late Lord de Ros has left it on record that as a Westminster boy (1809-1815) he slept in the chair one night, but found that his slumbers were much disturbed by rats. Beneath the Chair is the famous Stone of Scone. It is said to have been Jacob's pillow, but it is at least certain that it has been a sacred stone from almost the dawn of history in Scotland. On it all the early kings of Scotland were crowned. It was kept first at Dunstaffnage, and later at Scone, and was captured from the Scots in 1296.

Next to Edward I., but separated from him by the later altar screen, is the fine altar tomb of his brother, Edmund Crouchback, titular King of Sicily and Earl of Lancaster (d. 1296). He gained his name Crouchback (or crossed back) from his exploits in the Crusades and not from any physical deformity. The tomb, with its triple canopy, was made by Alexander of Abingdon, "le Imagour," and represents in stone the temporary hearse which was always erected in front of the altar at great mediæval funerals. It was originally painted all over, and recent cleaning has brought to light much of its former colour. Next to it is the somewhat similar tomb of his cousin Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke (d. 1324), son of that William de Valence, half-brother of Henry III., whose tomb (with its fine shield of Limoges enamel) is in one of the side chapels. Beyond, again, is Crouchback's wife Aveline (d. 1273), heiress of the Albemarle and De Redvers families. These three noble tombs are all about the same date, and may even be by the same artist. In front of them is the great mosaic pavement brought by Abbot Ware from Rome in 1268. Underneath it are buried three queens—Edith, wife of Edward the Confessor; Maud, wife of Henry I; and Anne, the daughter of the Kingmaker and wife of Richard III. Opposite is yet another queen, Anne of Cleves.

It is perhaps worth noting that in 1760 it was proposed to move Aymer's tomb in order to erect the monument to General Wolfe in its place. It was then believed that it was the tomb of some knight templar, " a very wicked set of " people, as his Lordship (the Dean) had heard, though he " knew nothing of them." This removal was fortunately prevented by Horace Walpole. But in 1808 it was thought that the chaste statue of Addison (now in Poets' Corner) " clad in " his dressing-gown and freed from his wig" would be a suitable and redeeming addition to the " rude Gothic monuments " which " instead of adorning, really cumber the Church " in the Confessor's Chapel. When they came to erect it, however, the ground gave way, and the scheme was reluctantly abandoned. These stories show how difficult it is for one age to foresee what will be valued in the next.

But let us retrace our steps to the Confessor's Chapel.

On the south side of the Confessor's Chapel stands the black and white marble tomb made in 1369 by Hawkin of Liège to commemorate Queen Philippa of Hainault, the wife of Edward III. The face of the effigy is evidently a portrait. The tomb has been much mutilated, and of the figures with which it was once enriched, two alone survive. Froissart described her as " the moost gentyll, moost lyberall, " moost courtesse that ever was queene in her dayes," and she lives in history by her intercession for the burghers of Calais and as the foundress of Queen's College, Oxford. It was her dying request that her husband should lie by her side in the Abbey Church. Edward died at Sheen on 21st June, 1377, and was buried in great state in the Abbey a fortnight later. The marble work of the tomb was made by Henry Yevele, who designed the nave of the Abbey. The face of the gilt bronze effigy with its "long silky beard, refined statuesque "nose and smooth but rather feminine brow" is traditionally supposed to have been taken from a mould after death. Among the so-called "Waxworks" at the Abbey is a wooden figure which is supposed to have been the effigy of the King carried at Edward's funeral. There still remain portions of the original red velvet mantle in which it was draped, and the face (though now beardless) bears a strong resemblance to that of the effigy on the tomb. On the ambulatory side of the tomb are six small gilt-bronze figures of his children. They include the Black Prince, Edmund Langley Duke of York, and Lionel Duke of Clarence. The six figures on the other side, which included John of Gaunt, no longer remain.

Between Edward III. and the altar screen is the large tomb of Richard II. and Ann of Bohemia. She died in 1394, and the tomb, which was designed by Henry Yevele, was made shortly afterwards under the King's personal direction. The gilt-bronze effigies made by Nicholas and Godfrey de Wodestreet may therefore be taken as authentic likenesses. The King is depicted in his coronation robes, on which may be seen the letters A and R, the Broom Pods, the Rising Sun, White Hart, and other badges of his House. He has a small forked beard, but the whole expression of the face is curiously weak and far less pleasing than that in the portrait of him as a younger man—the earliest known portrait of an English king—which hangs by the high altar. The Queen had been the one restraining influence in his life, and after her death he became practically uncontrollable. When Dean Stanley opened the tomb in 1871 he found the bones had been greatly disturbed, but he could find no mark of a blow on the skull, and there seems, therefore, no reason to doubt the story that the unfortunate King was really starved to death at Pontefract. The King's jawbone was missing, and the story of its recovery is a remarkable one. In the 18th century the stonework of the tomb was much broken. In 1766 a Westminster boy, Gerrard Andrewes, afterwards Dean of Canterbury, saw another Westminster boy "poke "his hand into the tomb . . . and fish out the lower jaw-"bone of the King." According to a family tradition he thrashed the boy but kept the bone himself, and it descended in the family from father to son. On a card attached to the bone was written in Gerrard Andrewes' handwriting "The "jawbone of King Richard the Second, taken out of his "coffin by a Westminster scholar, 1766." In 1906 the then representative of the family restored the jawbone to the Dean, and by permission of King Edward a hole was made in the tomb into which the bone was inserted, together with a written statement of the facts.

Henry IV., although he died within the Abbey precincts, had perhaps little wish to lie beside his immediate predecessors. His remains were interred, as he had himself directed, near to those of his uncle, the Black Prince, in Canterbury Cathedral. It was otherwise with his son. Henry V. from the first years of his reign took the deepest interest in the Abbey, which he enriched with many gifts. At the east end of the Confessor's Chapel he himself planned a chantry chapel, which by an ingenious design was made to extend as a kind of bridge over the ambulatory beyond. In order to obtain room for it it was necessary to encroach on the tombs of both Queen Eleanor and Queen Philippa, but this fact was not one which disturbed the mediæval mind. Henry died in France in 1422, and his funeral was one of the most magnificent which has ever taken place in the Abbey. The funeral chariot, upon which rested the effigy of the King in his full regalia, was followed by his three chargers, and was led up the half completed nave of the Abbey to the steps of the altar. The body was interred in the spot which he had himself chosen. Ten years later the greatest master mason of the time, Thirske, began the chantry chapel. All that remains of the effigy on Henry's tomb is now a headless wooden trunk. In 1545–6 the plates of silver gilt which covered it and the solid silver head were stolen; and although the thieves were caught, the damage was never repaired.

But the chantry is but little injured. It is reached by a double stair from the Confessor's Chapel, and was formerly used both as a chapel and as a relic chamber. On a beam above can be seen the shield, saddle and helmet which were carried at Henry's funeral. The sides of the chantry are covered with sculptured figures of saints. On each side are depicted the scene at the coronation of the King, and there is also a representation of Henry himself in full armour on horseback. These are probably the most authentic portraits of Henry in existence. Above the altar are full-sized figures of St. George and St Denis, representing Henry's claim to the throne of France, which was acknowledged at the Treaty of Troyes.

Underneath the altar is buried Katherine of Valois, Henry's queen. She had been buried in the old Lady Chapel, but on its demolition her body was wrapped in a sheet of lead and placed by the side of her husband's tomb. There it was exposed to public view, and was seen by Pepys, who "by particular favour" was allowed to have "the "upper part of her body in my hands, and I did kiss her "mouth, reflecting upon it that I did kiss a queen, and that "this was my birthday, thirty-six years old, that I did first "kiss a queen." After having been temporarily buried elswhere in the Abbey, she was finally buried in the chantry by Dean Stanley in 1878.

The circle of tombs round the shrine was now complete, and even in these early days it would seem that the question of space for future interments was causing concern. It happens that among the Abbey muniments there has been preserved an intensely interesting document which contains the sworn depositions of several persons who were present on more than one occasion when the Abbey was visited by Henry VI. One of them heard the King say, "Is it not fittyng that I "shulde have a place to be buryed in here nyghe to Seint "Edward where my fader and all my auncetors beth "buryed?" The Abbot suggested that "it was metely for "hym to lie in the chapell by his fadre kyng Henry the "Vth." Whereunto he answered and said, "Nay, let hym "alone, he lieth lyke a nobyll prince; I wolle not troble hym." Others suggested that Queen Eleanor's tomb might be removed. "Whereunto the seid kyng . . . . . shewed his "mynde and saide that it myghte not well be in that place." Then someone said that his tomb could be erected elsewhere. To which the King "gave them noone answere." Eventually after trying in vain to find a suitable place in the Lady Chapel, the King returned to the Confessor's Chapel and, leaning on Sir Richard Tunstall's shoulder, he borrowed a staff, and, pointing to the relic chest on the north of the shrine, asked if it could not be moved. The Abbot immediately agreed, whereupon the King "with his owne feete mett "out the length of vii foote befoore and nyghe the place "wher the Reliques than stoode and commawndyd a mason "than beying present-callyd Thurske . . . . to marke oute "there the place where he shulde lie which Thurske . . . . . "markyd out there the foresaid place withe an iron pykkes. "Which done, the seid kyng Henry seid to such as then "there were present these wordes 'forsoth and forsoth here "'is a good place for us.'"

But in spite of his wishes the "murdered saint" was to be buried, not at Westminster but at Windsor, and his only memorial at the Abbey is the long wavering scratch of Thurske's pickaxe on the stone floor, which was seen and identified by the late Mr. Westlake and myself nearly 450 years after this interesting story. Even the chapel which Henry VII. planned in his honour, and to which he purposed to transfer his remains, was eventually turned into a place of sepulchre for Henry VII. himself. The wide nave of that chapel shows that it was Henry's original intention to place in the centre of it two great tombs, one for Henry and one for himself. The chapel was built from 1503 to 1519, but before it was complete it was to receive the remains of the King's mother, Margaret Countess of Richmond (d. 1511). The Abbey has few more beautiful tombs. It is by Pietro Torrigiani, and he has contrived to put into the bronze effigy all the serene dignity of a great and gracious personality.

No one who looks at it could doubt that the foundress of St. John's and Christ's Colleges, Cambridge, was a remarkable character, of whom it has been said by a contemporary "that everyone who knew her loved her, and everything "that she said and did became her." Within the last few years the iron rail which surrounded her tomb was discovered and restored to the Abbey by the National Arts Collection Fund.

The tomb of Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York, from the same hand, is no less remarkable as a work of art, but its great bronze screen prevents it from being properly seen by the ordinary visitor. It is a wonderful Renaissance tomb, worthy in every way to rank with similar tombs in Italy. It formerly had an altar at its east end, and was finished by Torrigiani in 1518. The contract for the tomb is still preserved amongst the Abbey muniments. In the same vault Dean Stanley found the coffin of King James I.; the reason for its interment in this place remains a mystery. At the west end, under an altar made up of fragments of the original altar, rests Edward VI. The altar was destroyed in 1643, and, as Stanley points out, it is a strange paradox that "the only royal memorial destroyed by the Puritans should "have been that of the only Puritan Prince who ever sat on "the English throne." Queen Elizabeth and Mary, Queen of Scots, are both buried in the side aisles of Henry VII.'s Chapel. These monuments were erected by James I., who made the one stipulation that the monument to his own mother should be rather more magnificent than that to the queen who had signed her death warrant. Dean Stanley has recorded how in his search for the body of James I. he opened the tomb of Elizabeth, and found "in that contracted "sepulchre, admitting of none other but those two, the stately "coffin of Elizabeth resting on the coffin of Mary [Tudor]. "The sisters are at one; the daughter of Catherine of Arragon "and the daughter of Anne Boleyn repose in peace at last."

The tomb to Elizabeth, with the exception of the one designed to hold the bones of Edward V. and his brother, which were found in the Tower in 1674, was the last memorial to a sovereign erected at Westminster. A name and date cut on the floor are the only memorial of James I. and Anne of Denmark, Charles II., William and Mary, Anne, George II., and Queen Caroline. For a few brief years Cromwell, Blake, Desborough, and other Commonwealth worthies, were suffered to rest in the Abbey, but in 1661 it was "His Majesties express pleasure and command "that . . . . the bodies of the severall persons undernamed "which have been unwarrantablie interred in Henry the "7th and other Chappels and places within the Collegiate "Church of Westminster since the year 1641 be forthwith "taken up and buried in some place of the churchyard "adjoining to y^e said Church whereof you may not fail." In accordance with this command the bodies were disinterred, and, as has been pointed out, "by a strange irony of "history, [they] were thrown into a pit in the churchyard "just by the house which Abp. Laud had occupied when "he was a prebendary of Westminster."

The funeral of George II., so inimitably described by Horace Walpole, was the last interment of a sovereign in the Abbey Church; but in 1925, for the first time for nearly 200 years, the body of a queen rested in the Abbey for a few brief hours before the final interment at Windsor.

A DISCUSSION took place on

Mr. E. S. Cox (President) in the Chair.

Mr. C. HERBERT BEDELLS (Vice-President) said it hardly required to be said that it was with great pleasure that he accepted the President's invitation to move a very hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Lawrence Tanner for the most interesting talk he had given that evening. As on a previous occasion, the lecture had proved much more interesting because it was not confined to a formal Paper, but had been woven, as it were, round a most interesting series of slides of the Abbey. He was sure that to all the members who loved Westminster Abbey the fresh facts which the author of the Paper had brought to their attention would enhance its value and their interest in it.

He had had the pleasure within the last few months of seeing some of the less often visited cathedrals on the coasts of the Mediterranean. He had stood in the wonderful cathedral of Parma, the span of the nave of which was 71 feet centre to centre of the columns as compared with about 38 feet in Westminster Abbey, and with a height to the apex of the vaulting of about 147 feet, which was about half as high again as Westminster Abbey. He had also had the pleasure of standing in the cathedral of Mon Reale, where there were 70,000 superficial feet of fine mosaic. But after seeing such things, one came back to one's own country, and was not less content with the treasures that existed close at hand. One often gained, however, from the inspection of foreign cathedrals and places something which added to the interest with which one regarded the monuments of one's own country, and the little trip to which he had just referred had given him two new points of interest with regard to Westminster Abbey.

The first was with regard to the mosaics. He was afraid that he had almost forgotten the existence of the mosaics in Westminster Abbey, although, on the authority of the Record of the Historical Commission, they were practically unique so far as England was concerned. He thought there were only about two other places in England where similar Italian mosaic was to be found to any considerable extent. In the cloisters outside the cathedral of Mon Reale there were many columns in pairs, and, showing that human nature the wide world over was very much the same, the mosaic cubes which existed in the spiral grooves which encircled those twisted columns had disappeared, as they had done in connection with the twisted columns at the corners of the shrine of Edward the Confessor. The second point of interest he wished to mention was this: he happened to be at Regusa (Dubrovnik) which, as some of the members might know, was once in two parts. The two parts agreed to unite to form one strong-walled city, and for that purpose they had to fill up a narrow arm of the sea which had divided them. But when they came to join forces to make the one city, neither half was prepared to give up its own patron saint, but as a compromise they both agreed to accept St. Blaize. He was much interested recently in looking at a ground plan of Westminster Abbey to see that at one period of its history it had a chapel called "the Chapel of St. Blaize." He went to Westminster Abbey to look for this chapel, but all he found was a record on the stone pavement of the names of three or four persons who were buried in that chapel. He believed it was possible to identify one wall of the chapel in the north wall of what was now the Chapel of St. Faith.

There were many members present who remembered the author's previous lecture, and it was of particular interest to them to notice in the Journal that since the first Paper was written the custody of the muniments of the Abbey had come into the hands of Mr. Lawrence Tanner. He was sure all the members desired to congratulate the author on his appointment, because it was not often that a man's hobby became his duty. Sometimes there was a conflict between the claims of one's duties and one's hobbies; but when one's hobbies became one's duties, a blissful state of affairs had arrived which did not come to many of them. It was, perhaps, rather amusing that a custodian of the muniments of the Abbey should find some excuse for those persons who in early times were rather disposed to further individual ownership as compared with communal ownership.

There were one or two small points in the lecture to which he might draw attention. The author referred to the tomb of the Countess of Richmond, mother of Henry VII. It so happened that the tomb did not bear the name of the Countess of Richmond at the present moment, but was called the "tomb of the Countess of Beaufort." He was told the explanation was that the Countess of Richmond afterwards became the Countess of Beaufort. Whether that was so or not he did not know, but certainly, although she might have been twice married, she could hardly have had two deaths. The date which was given on the ticket on the tomb was 1511, and the date which was given in the author's Paper was 1509.

The author had also mentioned in his Paper the interesting fact that amongst the muniments of the Abbey was the contract for the tomb of King Henry VII. This was quite true, and a very interesting document it was. It was clear from it that the artist was accommodated in the precincts of the Abbey while he was carrying out the work for which he was commissioned.

It might also interest some of the members, especially those who were quantity surveyors, if they knew that in the British Museum there was an estimate which was given for a somewhat similar tomb for King Henry VIII., which was never carried out, but which showed how in those days they estimated the value of the "foundations" of the tomb; how much per inch the "weepers" cost; how large a provision was made for the stone, and what it then cost per foot cube to deliver that particular stone in London. An extraordinary wealth of information lay buried in the old documents, which fortunately were now in the possession or custody of people who loved them as well as understood them.

The Institution was contemplating a "Country Meeting" in London in 1928, and he could not imagine any more delightful item for an hour or two in that programme than a perambulation of Westminster Abbey in the charge of the author that evening. Spenser in the introduction to his Faerie Queene said:—

"The waies, through which my weary steps I guyde
    In this delightfull land of Faery,
Are so exceeding spacious and wyde,
    And sprinckled with such sweet variety
Of all that pleasant is to eare or eye,
    That I, nigh ravisht with rare thoughts delight,
My tedious travell doe forget thereby."

He thought that was the experience the author had had, and that the members desired to congratulate him very much as well as to thank him.

Before sitting down there was one other word he wished to say. On the occasion of the last lecture which Mr. Tanner gave, one of the members who took part in the discussion and who supported the vote of thanks was an old friend of a great many of those present that evening; he referred to Mr. William Woodward. There could be no doubt that Mr. William Woodward, had he been alive, would have been one of those who would have appreciated most keenly the Paper which the author had given. Mr. William Woodward had passed away at the ripe old age of 81; he joined The Institution in 1882, had contributed at least four Papers to the Transactions, and was always willing to add something to the interest of the meetings. Many members present had, no doubt, often availed themselves of his experience and common-sense as "third surveyor" in party-wall matters and otherwise, and would wish to be associated in an expression of sincere regret at his decease.

Mr. G. L. PEPLER (Fellow) said it gave him great pleasure to second the vote of thanks to Mr. Lawrence Tanner for his most interesting Paper. It was always a pleasure to listen to a man who was in love with his subject, particularly so when that love did not stifle his sense of humour. The members owed the author their gratitude not only for a Paper of fascinating interest, but also for having taken them for a short time away from the more worldly affairs which usually occupied their attention on those occasions. He had brought afresh to their minds the privilege they enjoyed in that The Institution stood almost under the shadow of the sacred building in which were enshrined so many emblems of the history of the country. Each period represented in the fashioning of the Abbey and its monuments had its characteristic. For example, they saw recorded in stone early English austerity, perpendicular elegance, Tudor richness, and the stoutish deportment of the Georges. Personally he rather loved some of the fat Georgian memorials.

One thought suggested by the address, which he had the privilege of reading before it was delivered, was Were they in present days too diffident in matters of art, or was it merely that all their serious attention was devoted to other things? The mediæval craftsmen paid little attention to past work if they thought they could better it, and, without doubt, their self-reliance had enriched our history. Not many years ago copious restorations were carried out in many churches up and down the country, but alas! art and craft did not go hand-in-hand. The reaction from that misguided, but well-meant, outburst had assumed such fear to touch anything old that it almost amounted to the indiscriminating attitude that if a thing be but old enough it must be good. Truly, most Victorian Gothic was a terrible warning; but there was now surely sufficient culture at their service to give them confidence to discriminate. Had the present age nothing that was worthy of permanent expression in a form that was of the present and not of the past? Probably the answer to that question was that even if the power of original and worthy expression existed it should be confined to new work, and not used for experiment in their treasured old buildings. That craftsmanship was not dead in this country had been shown notably in the recent restorations to St. George's Chapel, Windsor, where the pinnacled beasts, in the fashioning of which the mason was given almost a free hand, were full of life.

They would all be greatly interested to hear from Mr. Tanner what were his views with regard to the suggestions lately brought forward for clearing out some of the last century's effigies that commemorated nonentities and unduly crowded the Abbey. Also did the author think that the added and much-restored screen which interrupted an end-to-end vista of the great church might with advantage, be removed? His masterly Paper afforded no grounds for criticism, and so, like Oliver Twist, they asked for more.

Mr. H. MORDAUNT ROGERS (Fellow) desired to express his very keen appreciation and the great interest he had taken in Mr. Tanner's lecture. He thought the author had given them something of historical and chronological interest in the most explicit and entertaining manner in which a lecture could be delivered.

Personally he had taken a great interest in history, and he felt that several parts of the Continent which he had visited had filled up many of the gaps of history between Edward the Confessor and Queen Elizabeth,—practically the first king and the last queen whose memorials had been dealt with by the author that evening. He had visited Falaise, the birthplace of William the Conqueror: the Abbey of Jumièges, where Edward the Confessor was educated; Caen, where William the Conqueror and Matilda, his Queen, were buried in the Abbaye aux Hommes and the Abbaye aux Dames respectively; he had visited Fontevrault, and seen the effigies of Henry II., Richard Cœur de Lion, and of Isabelle of Angoulême, wife of King John; and he had been to Gloucester Cathedral, where, as the members had heard, one of our kings was buried. He had also visited Bayeux, and seen the so-called tapestry or needlework, which was of such great interest. Therefore he felt, after visiting Westminster Abbey and after seeing the pictures which had been shown of the wonderful monuments which existed there, that he knew something about the history of mediæval times.

Although he had been to Bayeux three or four times, he had never noticed until that evening, when he saw the little picture depicting Westminster Abbey at the edge of one of the slides, how great a similarity it bore to a casket, or what the French called a chásse, or miniature shrine, in which relics of saints were sometimes confined and shown in a cathedral. Many of the chásses or caskets, certainly up to the 12th and 13th centuries, had the shape of the Abbey depicted in Queen Matilda's needlework, and of the shrine which they had seen so clearly depicted later on, such as that of Edward the Confessor.

He wondered if the author could tell him whether it was the fact that the shrine of Edward the Confessor stood on a mound of earth which was brought from Palestine. In those days, owing to the Crusades, he thought it would have been quite easy to bring some earth from Palestine.

It was also particularly interesting to hear the work of William Torel, an Englishman, praised, and the work of Thomas, of Leighton Buzzard, compared with the work of such an Italian craftsman as Torrigiani. Speaking of that, he wondered if the author had noticed the curious similarity of Lady Margaret's hands by Torrigiani to the drawing of "Praying Hands" by Albert Dürer. The grille round the tomb of Henry VII. was particularly interesting, because it seemed to him to show the death of the Gothic and the birth of the Renaissance. One could almost see the one dying and the other being born. With regard to the chantry steps to which the author alluded, it was very interesting to know that in a little village in Brittany called St. Anne d'Auray, what was called a scala sancta of about 98 steps had been built within the last fifty years. If pilgrims went up those steps on their knees they were let off one sin for each step.

If a visit were paid to the Abbey of Westminster, or any other abbey where monuments existed, a particularly interesting point was to note the costumes of the period, and subsequently, when studying pictures, tapestry, or armour, it was often possible to date those items from the fact that one had seen similar costumes on the tombs and effigies.

He had referred to a few only of the places that he had visited; but he seldom passed through a village in England without trying to see the village church. For instance, there was a little village called Hackington, half a mile north of Canterbury, which motorists rushing through the city never thought of looking at, in which there was one of the most interesting monuments that could possibly be seen.

He had been to many cathedrals in France and had seen an enormous number of monuments, but nothing that he had seen could compare with the wonderful collection of historical and royal monuments which exist in Westminster Abbey. There it was at their doors for them to see and to admire, and he was sure the members would agree that nothing could have been more pleasing to them than to have had that collection described in the interesting and attractive manner that it had been that evening. They had had a most pleasant guide, in fact everything had been so charming to him that he could hardly find words in which to express his appreciation to the author for the pleasure he had given, not only to him, but to many another member of The Institution.

The vote of thanks was then put, and carried with acclamation.

Mr. LAWRENCE TANNER, in reply, thanked the members very much indeed for the kind manner in which they had received his lecture. Personally it had been a pleasure to him to lecture to such a delightful audience. There were one or two points which had been raised in the course of the discussion to which he desired to make a short reply. He was not sure about Lady Margaret. He had Dean Stanley's book in front of him, a work which was not always accurate, although he had the most profound admiration for the author. Dean Stanley said that she died on 29th June, 1509. Not only was she the wife of Humphrey Stafford, but, on his death, she became Countess of Richmond. She married a third time and became Countess of Derby, but in what year she died he was not sure.

The proposer of the vote of thanks had said something about the possibility of a visit to the Abbey being included in the programme of the Summer Meeting of The Institution in 1928. With regard to that he could only say that nothing would give him greater pleasure, and he hoped that those responsible for the programme would not hesitate to write to him in regard to the matter. It would afford him much pleasure to do all he could, and to take the members, perhaps, to some portions of the Abbey which were not generally seen by the public.

The next point, and it interested him very much, was the question raised with regard to the Bayeux needlework and the possibility that some of the mediæval reliquaries might quite conceivably represent the Abbey. It was a point which had vaguely occurred to him more than once, and was certainly one which ought to be considered. He thought it was not at all unlikely that in some places there might be found what was meant to be a reproduction of the Norman church.

He had always heard it said that the shrine of Edward the Confessor was built upon earth brought from the Holy Land. That it was upon an artificial mound was, he thought, certain, and he saw no reason to doubt the statement; but he could not give any chapter or verse for it other than that perhaps it was an oral tradition which had been passed down and which was probably true. He was very much interested in the mound. He wanted, greatly, to open the ground round the pillars of the shrine to know what was underneath, if it could be done without danger to the shrine. He had always had a half hope—in fact he was pretty sure—that the treasures of the Abbey were buried somewhere. It was a very significant fact that there were two inventories of the Abbey. One was the inventory of the treasure, which was made before the dissolution of the monasteries, and the other was the inventory which was made and sent in to the commissioners. Although a certain number of articles could be identified, a very large number of articles which appeared in the first did not appear in the second.

He had been much interested in what Mr. Rogers had said in regard to the question of the hands of Lady Margaret, and his suggestion that they were similar to the hands in one of Dürer's pictures. He had not noticed that point before, and he would certainly take an opportunity of comparing them. With regard to the Scala Cæli, there was one in Westminster, but it was not the steps to the Chantry of Henry V. (although those steps were worn into most uncomfortable hollows by the feet of the people who went up them), but it was the steps leading up into Henry VII. Chapel.

He thought he had dealt with the main points raised in the discussion. There was much that he would like to say on one particular point which had been mentioned, but he would not do so.

PAPER 510.

THE REPORTS OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON MINING SUBSIDENCE.

By Cecil H. Bailey (Fellow).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 9th January, 1928.

This Paper is supplemental to a Paper which was read before The Institution on 5th May, 1924. In that Paper an attempt was made to summarise the situation as regards mining subsidence at a time when the question was beginning to be considered by the Royal Commission.

This Royal Commission was appointed in June, 1923, and began to hear evidence in public on 15th October, 1923. Twenty-one public sittings were held, at which 55 witnesses appeared.

Of these witnesses 28 were representatives of local authorities, public utility companies, and property-owners, each of whom, as representing owners of property liable to damage, laid before the Commission their particular difficulties arising out of the existing situation.

Ten witnesses were officials of various Government departments, 11 witnesses gave evidence on behalf of those interested in the working of coal and iron stone, and 6 witnesses were purely technical.

The Commission has issued two Reports. The first, dated 21st December, 1925, deals with the problem of the drainage of the area known as the Doncaster area, and the second, dated 23rd June, 1927, deals with the question in general.

The Commission was concerned solely with coal and stratified minerals. It is only by the mining of these that widespread damage to property is caused in this country. It is natural that the most thickly populated areas are to be found where coal has been or is being worked, and in consequence the property liable to damage is just where damage is most likely to be caused.

The Doncaster Area.

In the First Report the Commission deals with the special problems arising from the probability of very extensive working of coal under the low-lying lands which constitute the basin of the Humber. It may be stated for the information of those who do not know that within the last twenty years a very great extension of the area containing economically workable coal has been proved and partly developed to the east in Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire.

The Report states that a large part of this area is only a few feet above sea level; and as it is estimated that probably a total subsidence of 21 feet will take place, it is obviously a matter of importance that some arrangement should be made to preserve the surface which, to a great extent, is valuable agricultural land.

The Commission recommended the appointment of a further body to investigate this matter. This body was appointed in 1926, and work is proceeding now in the area for the purpose of obtaining the necessary information to enable the problem to be dealt with. It is to be hoped that the Commissioners will be able to deal with the drainage in some way, so that while the nation benefits by the working of one valuable asset it may not be called upon to sacrifice the other.

It is important to distinguish, as was said in the 1924 Paper, between "subsidence" and "damage due to subsidence." It was only with the latter that the Commission was concerned.

From the first it became clear that the Commissioners were involved in the fundamental difficulty of the problem, which all who deal with the matter must very soon meet. This fundamental difficulty is the practical impossibility of getting any accurate knowledge of facts upon which it is possible to build any reliable theory which can be applied in general.

The Report calls this a "quality of uncertainty."

From the surveyor's point of view this lack of reliable data makes it impossible to decide definitely—

(1) whether subsidence damage will take place if a mineral is worked;

(2) which of two adjacent workings has caused damage;

(3) whether damage has been caused by mine workings or by some other means, such as defective foundations.

The surveyor is left to decide these questions entirely on his experience, supported by such facts as he can ascertain in the particular case with which he is dealing.

The Commissioners, no doubt, hoped and tried hard to extract facts and figures which would help them to make definite suggestions for dealing with the problem before them, but all the facts and figures produced fell short of that completeness which alone would have served. The result is that the matter stands practically where it was, and it is a relief to know that except for one recommendation the Commission has not tried to justify its existence by making suggestions which would merely result in the burden of the cost of subsidence damage being transferred from the shoulders of one party to those of another.

This transferring of the burden was the only suggestion made by any of the witnesses who had any suggestion to make.

Nevertheless, certain valuable suggestions have been put forward by the Commission, and it is proposed to summarise these quite shortly for the purpose of inviting discussion upon them.

Familiarity with the Report is assumed in what is written here; it is desired to avoid lengthy quotation or a mere rewriting of the Report. The numbers in brackets refer to the paragraphs of the Second Report.

Broadly, the questions which are discussed by the Commissioners are these:—

(1) Can damage due to subsidence be prevented or lessened?

(2) Does the existing law bear unfairly on any section of the community?

The answer to the first question is divided into two parts:—

(1) Precautions to be taken underground;

(2) Precautions to be taken on the surface.

As to precautions to be taken underground, the Commission considered the question of the adoption of methods of working coal which would have the effect of minimising subsidence. A full investigation of the possibilities of hydraulic stowage was made for them by Major Hudspeth, and the decision was that this method of packing the goaves or wastes is not universally practicable.

Major Hudspeth's is not the only investigation which has been carried out; it was also investigated by the late Sir Arthur Markham about 1912 to 1913, and he definitely decided that the cost was prohibitive.

The cost of 1*s.* 3*d.* a ton mentioned in the Report is one which in itself would make it impossible to adopt the method. The figure of 1*s.* or 2*s.* a ton was that arrived at by Sir Arthur Markham before the war.

There is, however, very little doubt that damage due to subsidence can be materially increased by a haphazard and irregular method of working. Experience goes to show that the risk of damage is on the whole least when the seam of coal is completely extracted by a systematic long-wall method. The leaving of pillars for support is often the cause of damage; and if it is expected that by the working of a part only of a seam damage may be avoided, it will usually be found that the amount which can be so extracted is so small a part that it is not an economical proposition.

As regards precautions to be taken on the surface, the recommendations made by the Commission may be summarised as follows:—

(1) The building of houses in blocks of two or four instead of in terraces and rows;

(2) The use of cement mortar instead of lime mortar;

(3) The provision of reinforced concrete foundations.

There is a great deal to be said on all these points, but, at the moment, the only thing that need be said is that the Commission appear to be much too optimistic on the question of the increased cost of special methods of construction.

It is almost certain that the houses which have been provided in recent years by public authorities are too expensive for the ordinary working-class family to live in, and the cost of building is a very difficult one for architects to face.

The Commission also recommend that building bye-laws should take account of the necessity of special precautions in areas subject to mining subsidence.

It would appear, therefore, that there is no royal road to avoidance of the consequences to the surface of the removal of the coal from below. It is a matter to be dealt with by foresight and care, and by making the best compromise when all the facts have been taken into consideration.

Let us now pass on to the second question which the Commission had before them, which was to consider whether the existing law bears unfairly on any section of the community.

Local Authorities.

Local authorities and statutory companies were strongly represented before the Commission, and strong claims were made for the increase of their rights to compensation for damage to their property. The Commission, however, have decided against these claims, but have suggested that such works as canals, &c., should be brought under a similar arrangement to that made with the railways and embodied in Part II. of the Mines (Working Facilities) Act, 1923 (68).

Presumably the courts would apply the principal of the Howley Park judgment to any works which have rights under the "Mining Code," and cases have occurred where a threat to institute legal proceedings has obtained something more in the way of support than is given by the "Mining Code."

A recommendation which, if carried into law, will help the local authorities is that the disability imposed on them and on statutory undertakings to which the code applies by Section 13 of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, should be removed. In this way they will be able to take advantage of Section 8, and apply for special protection for works which belong to them (75).

The justification for the recommendation that the disability should be removed, while the special privileges are retained is "that the provisions of the code are no longer "completely appropriate to their case."

The Report expressly excludes (77 to 80) tramways, electricity and gas undertakings from this recommendation, but it is difficult to see the reason.

It is also interesting to note that without waiting for this Report Parliament passed the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926, in which Section 44 (2) reads:—

> "Where the Board or any authorised undertakers have in pursuance of powers conferred on them under section twenty-two of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, erected on any land supports for an electric line above ground, the Board or undertakers shall, for the purposes of section eight of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, be deemed to be persons having an interest in the land on which such supports are erected."

The last part of paragraph 80 is apparently intended to apply to gas undertakings which are not owned by public authorities, as these are governed by the Gas Clauses Acts 1847 and 1871. It is, however, difficult to understand why they should not have the same privileges as electricity undertakings. Gas mains are more difficult to maintain in ground subject to subsidence than overhead electric lines.

A distinction might be made between "works" and "distribution lines." It is unreasonable that unlimited powers should be conferred on these authorities to require support for "distribution lines," but it is clearly against the "national interest" that a large gasworks representing an outlay of perhaps £500,000 should be endangered by the threat to work a small quantity of coal worth about £1,000.

Town Planning.

The Report recommends that it should be made (126) compulsory for colliery companies to furnish prospective builders and local authorities with particulars of coal workings and future developments.

The success of this scheme will depend very largely on having a thoroughly competent mining engineer to advise in a general way as to the possibilities of the future.

In this connection it can be said that there are districts where coal mining has been carried on for many years, in which further exploration for small remaining pockets of coal might very well be prohibited. The extraction of these small pockets is liable to cause damage out of all proportion to their value, and the possibility of extraction holds up the land for any use to which it can be put for other purposes.

It is not suggested that legislative action should be taken to effect this prohibition in a general way, but there are one or two regions where the proposal might be well worth investigation.

Small House Property.

The most drastic recommendation made by the Commission is one in which it is most difficult to anticipate the effect—this is the proposal to restore the right to support or compensation to houses of £40 or less rateable value.

It is a question of the increased cost which will be imposed on the industry, and it was just on this question of cost that most of the evidence broke down.

Three expert witnesses ventured an estimate of cost of subsidence damage. Mr. Forster Brown's estimate was based on a particular case arising on the extraction of 500 acres of coal. It would have been interesting if he had said whether the cost would have been increased by this proposal of the Commission. Mr. Forster Brown did not suggest that his figures could be applied universally.

Mr. O'Donahue's estimate was based partly on experience in Lancashire and partly on more general considerations, and appeared to be rather less than that of Mr. Forster Brown.

Mr. Hassam's estimate was very much lower, and was based on figures which were largely a matter of conjecture.

One penny per ton on the present output of coal in the United Kingdom is £1,000,000, and it would be a surprising thing if this sum is being and has been regularly paid to property-owners as compensation for mining subsidence damage. This, however, is not quite the right way to look at it. It is possible that the sudden acquisition of this right to compensation may in some cases upset the calculations of a particular mine-owner, who may be faced with heavy claims from property-owners, the value of whose property depends upon the presence of the mine-owner.

The grievance of the small property-owner was the chief reason for the appointment of the Commission, and no doubt in many cases it is right that he should be helped.

Some attempt might be made to discover more accurately than the Commission were apparently able to do the extent to which small house property lacks the right to support.

There are a few further points which are dealt with in the Report which may be briefly referred to.

Buchanan v. Andrew.

The recommendation (109) of the Commission for dealing with the situation arising out of the decision in the case of Buchanan v. Andrew appears to be common-sense, and no doubt legislation will be introduced to carry this into effect. It would, however, be interesting to hear an argument on the other side.

Compensation.

It is a great satisfaction to find that the suggestion of forming a pool for the provision of compensation is rejected (118) for the first reason mentioned in the Paper in 1924. The Commissioners do not trouble to discuss at all the other difficulties and objections mentioned on page 262 of Vol. LVI. of the Transactions of The Surveyors' Institution.

Colliery Plans.

The recommendation (126) that local authorities should have the right to inspect plans has already been mentioned above. The Report is not at all clear as to what rights of inspection are to be conferred on the small property-owners when they merely say "some action is called for." Incidentally it may be of interest to mention that the Report of the Water Dangers Committee recently published recommends that plans of adjoining workings should be open to mutual inspection.

APPENDIX.

The following is a summary of the position and main recommendations contained in the Second and Final Report of the Royal Commission on Mining Subsidence :—

" The position as disclosed in the body of this Report, with our main recommendations, may now be summarised as follows :—

> (a) Our inquiry has been concerned almost exclusively with coal mining, and its effect upon the stability of the surface. Our recommendations, however, are intended to apply to the mining of other stratified minerals as well. (Para. 5.)
> (b) While some surface subsidence as a result of coal mining is inevitable, its extent is not quantifiable, and cannot be accurately predicted, even when all the conditions are tolerably well ascertained. Moreover, whilst subsidence is admittedly inevitable, damage due to that subsidence is by no means a necessary consequence.
> (c) By precautions not normally prohibitive in cost the effects of subsidence upon surface buildings can now be minimised. (Para. 10.) Some of the existing damage might have been obviated had greater foresight in construction been exercised.
> (d) In many cases the remedy of the surface-owner in respect of subsidence damage is adequate. We have not been concerned with these cases. Our main concern has been with cases in which for one reason or another the owner of the damaged property is without remedy for the damage he has sustained. (Para. 14.)

(e) The three main principles of law which govern the position are—

(1) That the law both of England and Scotland recognises and protects a property in unsevered minerals as complete as the property it recognises and protects in land itself. (Para. 18.)

(2) That where the surface and subjacent and adjacent strata are in separate ownerships the surface in its natural state is entitled to support.

(3) That landowners have an unfettered right to make such stipulations as they please when they grant out the surface and the minerals separately. (Para. 25.)

"In many cases minerals have been granted or reserved without liability on the part of the mineral owner to make to the surface-owner, in respect of subsidence damage due to their working, even compensation in money. It is mainly owing to provisions of this kind that many owners of buildings damaged by subsidence are without remedy. (Paras. 26 and 27.)

(f) The property so affected may be roughly divided into two classes :—

(1) The property of local authorities and public utility companies in respect of sewers, water, gas or electricity mains, tramway lines, and the like.

(2) Houses and other buildings, to whomsoever these may belong. (Para. 31.)

(g) The damage, in the aggregate, caused to these properties by subsidence is less than we had expected it to be. (Para. 40.)

(h) Much may in the future be done to minimise such damage.

"The following suggested remedies are discussed:—

(1) Hydraulic stowage. (Paras. 46-49.)

(2) More scientific methods of mining. (Para. 49.)

(3) Scientific lay-out of surface. (Paras. 50-51.)

(4) Precautions to be taken in the construction of surface buildings. (Para. 52.)

(5) Enlightened building bye-laws. (Para. 53.)

(i) When the result of coal mining has been or will be either permanently or for an indefinite period to sterilise large areas of surface land, a problem similar to that arising in the Doncaster area is presented. The Report of the Commission now inquiring into the position in the Doncaster area will be of the first importance with reference to all areas similarly situated. (Para. 57).

(j) With regard to the property mentioned in clause (f) (1) above, we are not, for reasons given in Paras. 69-74 and 77-81, prepared to make any recommendations as to compensation. We are of opinion, however, that the right given to other persons, under Part I. of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, to prohibit and restrict the working of minerals should be extended to local authorities and statutory undertakings to which the code applies.

(k) With regard to the property mentioned in clause (f) (2) above, for the reasons given in paragraphs 82–98, we are not prepared to make any recommendations as to compensation in the case of existing buildings other than those which we now particularise.

We recommend that private owners or occupiers of existing houses of an annual value not exceeding £40 who at present have no right of support or right to compensation for damage caused by the withdrawal of support through mineral workings, shall, subject to certain conditions, have a right to compensation for such damage accorded them. Such compensation shall be recoverable from any person who at any time has carried on operations for the extraction of minerals, under or adjacent to the house likely to cause subsidence of the site of the house, without prejudice to the right of relief of any such person against the person actually responsible for the damage. Claims for compensation shall be enforceable in England in the County Court (irrespective of the amount thereof), and in Scotland in the Sheriff Court of the county in which the house is situated. In neither case shall there be any appeal to the High Court (or the Court of Session) on any question of fact. (Paras. 94, 121, and the Schedule.)

(l) In the case of claims for damage to houses the owners of which already possess a right to compensation, we recommend that where the value of the hereditament in respect of which the claim is made does not exceed the sum of £700 the complainant being a private person should at his option have the benefit of the same procedure in all respects as that described in the preceding recommendation. (Para. 124.)

(m) In order that the purchaser, or lessee, or feuar of land or tenements with no right to support or to compensation for damage due to its withdrawal may not be imposed upon or left in ignorance of his position, it should be made incumbent upon the vendor, or lessor, or superior, to indorse upon the conveyance, or lease, or feu contract, a definite statement as to the position of the subjects in that respect, under pain, in case of neglect or omission so to do, of remaining liable to the purchaser, or lessee, or feuar, or his successors in interest, for the consequences of subsidence if and when it takes place. (Para. 108.)

(n) We recommend that the effect of the House of Lords decision in Buchanan v. Andrew should, to an extent, be abrogated, and that it should be laid down by statute that in the case of surface dispositions to the effect stated, the feuar or lessee is not to be liable to uphold the premises in good repair against damage due to the withdrawal of support. (Paras. 109 and 110.)

(o) We recommend the introduction of such legislation as may be found necessary in order to provide for the compulsory disclosure, subject to proper safeguards, of colliery underground plans (a) to prospective builders in general, and to local authorities in particular in connection with the preparation and subsequent development of town planning and housing schemes, and (b) to owners of houses of the type referred to in Recommendations (k) and (l) above who desire to prefer claims for compensation for damage believed to be due to subsidence occasioned by mineral workings. (Paras. 51, 75 and 126.)

(p) We recommend that with a view to remove existing anomalies negotiations similar to those which resulted in the passing of Part II. of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, should now be set on foot, with a view to the introduction of legislation to amend the code in its application to undertakings other than railways. In connection with this recommendation we suggest (a) the extension of the benefits of the code to cover public buildings, public baths, recreation grounds, cemeteries, &c., to which they do not now apply, and (b) the increasing of the prescribed distance, at any rate for the purposes of notice, to one-half the depth of the seam. (Para. 65.)

"In addition to the above specific recommendations, we have expressed the hope (a) that the British Colliery Owners' Research Association will expedite its promised inquiry into the methods of working coal, with special reference to the mitigation of subsidence (Para. 49); (b) that in connection with the subsidence problem local authorities will take full advantage of the very wide powers conferred on them by the Town Planning Acts (Para. 51); (c) that every encouragement will be extended to local authorities to carry out experiments by way of testing the relative merits of the different special methods of construction (Para. 52); (d) that local authorities will give special consideration to subsidence damage in framing their building bye-laws, and that these bye-laws will be frequently revised to keep them abreast of advancing scientific knowledge (Para. 53)."

A DISCUSSION took place on

THE REPORTS OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON MINING SUBSIDENCE.

Mr. E. S. Cox (President) in the Chair.

Mr. E. H. Leeder (Vice-President) said he accepted with great pleasure the invitation of the President to move a very hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Cecil Bailey for his excellent resumé of the Report of the Royal Commission on Mining Subsidence, and wished to congratulate Mr. Bailey heartily on the able manner in which he had dealt with a very complex subject, with the evident object of obtaining a discussion which might have the ultimate effect of assisting those members of the profession whose business it was to deal with mining matters to form definite opinions that would in the end assist the Government in arriving at a conclusion as to whether further legislation was necessary in connection with the many points arising from time to time in connection with damage by subsidence caused by mining operations.

He felt somewhat diffident in discussing the matter owing to the fact he was not a mining surveyor. At the same time, as agent for estates in South Wales and representing owners of both surface and minerals, he had, during the past 45 years, had some experience of claims made in connection with subsidences arising from mineral workings and other causes.

Mr. Bailey called attention to the difficulty in which the 1924 Commissioners were involved in obtaining an accurate knowledge of facts on which it was possible to build any reliable theory that could be applied in general as to (1) whether subsidence damage would take place if a mineral was worked, (2) which of two adjacent workings had caused the damage, and (3) whether the damage had been caused by mine workings or by some other means, such as defective foundations. Personally he was inclined to think that everyone was in the same quandary.

With regard to the first heading, it was generally admitted by most mining surveyors that all mining operations caused subsidence to some extent. In certain cases it might merely extend to a general depression of the surface without causing serious damage; on the other hand, if the measures worked were very steep or near the surface and the strata of a certain character, considerable damage might result, possibly not at the time the actual working took place, but subsequently when the timbering gave way owing to decay or other causes.

Under the second heading it was, he believed, frequently found in practice that damage might result to a mineral property by an adjoining company drawing off the water from old workings belonging to another undertaking, resulting in damage by subsidence to the surface belonging to an owner who had no interest in the minerals that were being worked, but yet was liable under covenant to compensate building lessees for any damage resulting from mining operations and for quiet possession.

Finally, with regard to the third heading, it was always a very difficult problem to determine whether the damage had arisen from actual mining operations or from defective construction. Most of the claims that arose under this head were in respect of houses erected by speculative builders, who rushed to new centres of mining activity and erected rows of artisans' dwelling of the cheapest and most jerry-built type, which they consequently sold to colliery employees and small investors.

The suggestions made by witnesses before the Commissioners for transferring the burden from the shoulders of one party to those of another was a time-honoured expedient. The lessor of the surface naturally endeavoured to get out of it by saddling the mining lessee with the responsibility, and the mining lessee, in his turn, tried as far as possible to avoid responsibility. There were doubtless arguments in favour of each. The one had possibly let land at low ground rents to assist the mining lessee in retaining labour near the colliery which benefited both parties, and the natural conclusion was that both parties should contribute according to their respective interests. The owner of minerals, however, did not in general receive such an enormous income as was often supposed from royalities which, on the basis of 6*d*. a ton, worked out approximately at from £30 to £37 per cubic foot of coal per acre, less 10 per cent. mineral rights duty and miners' welfare levy. At the same time, under present-day conditions, it was only the best and most modernly equipped concerns that were able to work at a profit.

In reply to the two questions discussed by the Commissioners, the first was "Can damage due to subsidence be "prevented or lessened?" There was no doubt, if precautions were taken underground and the old workings carefully packed or gobbed, damage could be lessened, but at considerably increased cost—so much so that the trade in its present condition was unable to bear it. Hydraulic stowage was a remedy, but the objection to it was that if an adjoining undertaking opened out lower measures, the effect might be to remove the water, often with disastrous results. The abstraction of the water in the subsoil might in itself cause subsidence. Only recently a case occurred, in which he was particularly interested, where a gas company constructed a concrete raft and erected a holder on it. The pumping out of water from the adjoining subsoil caused the raft, which was over 100 feet in diameter, to be depressed to the extent of 7 inches on one side and 5 inches on the other; it, however, righted itself upon the water resuming its normal level on the cessation of pumping operations.

He entirely concurred with Mr. Bailey's statement that the leaving of pillars for support was often a cause of damage. He remembered a case where a large residence was seriously affected thereby, but which, after the pillar underneath had been worked out, was effectively repaired at a very small cost.

The surface precautions recommended by the Commissioners were undoubtedly sound, and were largely adopted to-day by builders and building authorities, the best method of the three suggested being the provision of reinforced concrete foundations or, better still, concrete rafts. He was also in agreement with the recommendation of the Commissioners that building bye-laws should take into consideration the necessity for special precautions in areas subject to mining subsidence; but great care should be exercised not to make these too drastic.

He would not detain the meeting longer by further remarks on Mr. Bailey's Paper, but, if he had not wearied his hearers, would like to give, briefly, particulars of three cases of subsidence which had come under his notice, and which were of great interest owing to their arising from three entirely different causes.

The first was that of an estate in South Wales. A large mineral area was let to a company, which started operations and proceeded to work coal. After about five or six years the principal owner discovered that his mansion, which was an old and really well-built house, was showing signs of subsidence; cracks appeared in the ceilings and walls, which gradually increased in size, and the windows and doors dragged and would not open. He then employed a mining surveyor to inspect the colliery workings. This was done and the working plans carefully checked, with the result it was found the nearest working face was over a mile away. After a time it leaked out the night shift employed in repairing the haulage roads used to send up daily a number of trams filled with sand. On hearing this, the owner's representatives obtained samples. It proved to be an extraordinarily fine sand, and was absolutely soluble in water. Bore-holes were then made in the neighbourhood of the house, and a similar bed of sand was located under the house, which proved to be the identical bed of running sand the colliery company had cut through in several places during their mining operations. The house was subsequently made secure by underpinning and cementation, and is now, to all intents and purposes, in as good a condition as it ever was. The colliery company, however, had to foot the bill, which amounted to a considerable sum.

The next instance was that known as the Raven case, often quoted by the legal fraternity and others in connection with matters of the kind under discussion. A company had taken a lease of a considerable area of minerals from several owners, and the colliery was sunk on the land of the largest owner. The lease contained the usual clauses adopted in that particular district, amongst them being a covenant to work the mines and minerals in the most approved manner, not to work within 15 yards of any existing building, and to pay compensation for any damage done. The company, in due course, proceeded to open out and work the coal in one of the upper seams. Some time afterwards, the owner's agent, finding a demand for building purposes, constructed a road across the estate and proceeded to grant building leases for terms of 99 years, with provision for payment of compensation for any damage done by mining operations, also a covenant for quiet possession, and a number of houses were erected. For several years nothing transpired, but all at once the colliery company changed the direction of their workings and began to operate towards the houses. The result was in the course of a short time a very large number of the houses in question showed signs of damage. The case was submitted to counsel, who expressed the opinion the colliery company was liable. Ultimately a test case was brought against the lessor and the colliery company, with the result the court decided the colliery company had worked the minerals in the most approved and usual manner, as they were entitled to do under the terms of their lease, and that no liability attached to them. The court also found the houses had been damaged by mining operations and that the lessor of the surface was liable. The costs of the action amounted to a large sum, and the lessor, rather than pay compensation, bought and repaired the whole of the damaged houses.

The third case was that of a colliery which worked out the whole of the coal in a certain area leased to them and abandoned it. After about thirty years large subsidences took place as and when the timbering gave way. His firm was called in on a number of occasions to assess the damage, which, as the surface was used only for agricultural purposes, mainly consisted of filling in the subsidences with soil, ramming it well and seeding it out. The colliery lease terminated subsequently, and to-day the whole of the road frontage is covered with bungalows and subsidy houses. What the future result would be he did not know; but if the colliery were ever re-started and the water in the workings removed, serious subsidences might result, and the owners possibly find they have no remedy against the ground landlord. A further nice point might also then arise as to whether the new colliery proprietors were the parties liable for any damage or not.

He had very great pleasure in proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Bailey for his Paper.

Mr. W. Forster Brown (Fellow) said it gave him great pleasure to second the vote of thanks to Mr. Bailey for his interesting Paper. He thought it very desirable that the conclusions of Commissions on subjects in which The Institution was interested should be discussed by The Institution before the conclusions were translated into law, and the members were very much indebted to Mr. Bailey for having brought so clearly before them the conclusions at which the Royal Commission on Mining Subsidence had arrived.

He thought all those who had to deal with subsidence from mine workings would agree the Commission had come to sound conclusions and had gone as far as was justifiable in trying to meet what might be called legitimate grievances. Mr. Bailey pointed out that the Commission had been unable to obtain such an accurate knowledge of the facts as to lay down any general theory as to the amount of subsidence which would take place under certain circumstances, or whether any subsidence would take place. He thought that must necessarily always be so. It might be possible to arrive at some general conclusions—perhaps some conclusions had been arrived at—and more precise knowledge might be obtained as time went on, but there were so many factors which entered into the question of subsidence that he did not believe it was possible, without very careful consideration of every factor in each case, to arrive at any sort of opinion as to the amount, if any, of subsidence which was going to take place.

The first point discussed by the Commission was given by Mr. Bailey as "Can damage due to subsidence be "prevented or lessened?" He anticipated the answer to both these questions was "In some cases, yes; in more "cases, no." He thought it was possible, in some cases, to leave sufficient mineral in pillars, which, if they were large enough and regular enough, might prevent subsidence; but the amount of mineral that would have to be left was very considerable, and it was only in some cases that the mineral could be profitably worked. Much would depend on the nature of the surface overlying the minerals.

With regard to the precautions which the Commission suggested could be adopted to minimise subsidence, they set out certain precautions that could be taken in erecting buildings on the surface, and they had also obtained a detailed examination of the probable effects of hydraulic stowage in minimising subsidences, the main point being that hydraulic stowage would not absolutely prevent subsidence but that it certainly minimised it. They also discussed in a general way the effect of different methods of working in lessening the subsidence on the surface, and they referred to the proposed investigation by the British Colliery Owners' Research Association into the effect of certain systems of working on the surface. In that connection he hoped it might be possible for that association to investigate the point of the angle at which workings ought to approach an area covered with buildings. If, for example, terraces of houses were erected on a slope coinciding with a dip in the strata, was more damage caused by workings approaching those buildings up the rise of the strata, or was less damage done by workings carried across on the level? or, to put it the other way round, was less damage in certain circumstances done to houses built in terraces along the breast of the hill rather than along the slope of the hill? He thought some good might result from an investigation of that matter in its many variations.

The second point which the Commission considered was given by Mr. Bailey as "Does the existing law bear unfairly "on any section of the community?" The conclusion to which the Commission came could, he thought, be fairly summarised by saying the law did not, but private contracts in some cases did. The Commission attempted to meet that point by recommending that private owners or occupiers of existing houses of an annual value not exceeding £40, who had at present no right of support or right to compensation, should have that right restored to them. He thought most people would agree that when a private owner had built a house on the surface, and a mining company or lessee worked the coal from underneath that surface, the tenant had a primâ facie grievance; but whether that grievance was a legitimate one depended, he thought, on whether when he took his lease of the surface he had an opportunity of realising what risk he was undertaking or the amount of risk he was undertaking. It was not difficult to realise there were cases where the surface tenant might not have known of the risk, or, if he knew of the risk, might not have known of the extent of the risk he undertook; or he might have been forced by outside exigencies to build on a certain site, whereas if he had been a free agent he would have built elsewhere. Cases of that sort had arisen in certain districts owing to the fact that to some extent there had been a departure from the old maxim that he who caused damage should pay for it.

There was a tendency in certain districts when an applicant came forward to take a mineral lease for him to refuse to be liable for damage to any buildings erected on the surface overlying his minerals subsequent to the date of his lease. The mineral lessor, if he was also the surface-owner, might in such a case, when he came to lease his surface, refuse to guarantee any support for the surface. The surface tenant was then left without redress, and, of course, if the financial position of that surface tenant was such that he could not remedy the damage caused to him, what might be called a legitimate grievance became a hardship. He apprehended it was cases of that sort the Commission attempted to meet in their recommendation to restore to the small householder his right of compensation or support.

The chief ground on which a mineral lessee based his objection to paying for damage to buildings erected subsequent to his lease was that he had taken a mineral area upon a certain rent and royalty, and he might have in his mind a certain approximation of the compensation he might have to pay for surface damage. If the area was subsequently built over, naturally all his calculations might be upset, and he might find his rent and royalty were too high, as much of the coal might have to be left in for support.

It occured to him that where the mineral and the surface were in the same hands, the matter might be capable of adjustment. For instance, the surface-owner might agree with his mineral lessee, when letting his minerals, that he would not allow houses of more than such and such an aggregate value per acre, or of a certain rental value, to be erected on the surface, and it might then be possible for the mineral lessee to get some fairly close approximation of what his liabilities were likely to be, and agree as to his rent and royalty accordingly.

Another method which occurred to him was that, where the damage was likely to be considerable, the mineral lessor might agree to put aside a definite sum out of the royalties on the coal, and invest that sum in some good security, the capital of that sum to be treated as a fund to help the mineral tenant so far as it extended. The income from the fund would be treated as the income of the mineral lessor as long as it lasted. Those were two ways which occurred to him; others would no doubt suggest themselves to other people.

In his experience the cost of paying compensation for private house property in colliery districts was not usually so prohibitive as to call for any transference of the liability from the shoulders of the colliery company or mining lessee who caused the damage. The case he quoted before the Commission was cited with a view to bringing out that point —that, so far as his experience went, there was no justification for the creation of a pool, which would have the effect of causing mineral lessees who were not causing damage to contribute to those who were. If the cost generally where surface damage occurred was not greater than in the case he had in mind, it would appear quite unnecessary, and it would be unjust to make a levy on the coal trade as a whole for the purpose of meeting those claims. To do so, moreover, would probably lead to less care in working under house property, since it would be known that the cost of the damage would be spread over numbers of other people, so that it would not be a serious matter for the person working the coal.

The only argument that could be advanced by the advocates of a pool, so far as he could see, was that it would make the surface tenant sure of his compensation, whereas at present in rare instances he might suffer loss, and be without redress because the colliery worker came to grief. That was an argument which in his opinion would have had very much more force thirty or forty years ago, when coal was generally worked at shallower depths and in much smaller units. His own view was that such cases were now so rare that they could not justify the creation of a pool and a levy on the coal trade as a whole.

Mr. Bailey asked whether the recommendation made by the Commission to restore the right to support or compensation to houses of £40 or less rateable value would make any difference to the cost of subsidence damage which he quoted to the Commission. The answer was in the negative, as under the lease of the colliery company in question they were responsible for the damage they did to the class of property concerned.

It gave him much pleasure to second the vote of thanks to Mr. Bailey.

Sir RICHARD REDMAYNE, K.C.B. (Hon. Member), said it gave him great pleasure to support the vote of thanks so ably moved and seconded by the two preceding speakers. He had very little to say, because he was in such complete agreement with what had fallen from Mr. Bailey and from Mr. Forster Brown.

He wished to calm Mr. Bailey's fear as to the way in which the word "subsidence" should be pronounced. Both he and the mover and seconder of the vote of thanks had called it "subsīdence." When dining in company with the Chairman of the Royal Commission a short time ago he called it "subsīdence," and the Chairman said "I am glad "to hear you so pronounce the word. I am a Scotsman "and call it subsīdence." He replied that they might be classically correct, because it was derived from sub sideo, but that when he sat down in a chair he did not "subsĭd" into the chair.

The Paper was a very natural, proper and welcome corollary to Mr. Bailey's previous Paper, and, having been associated with Mr. Bailey when he was young and tender, it was very interesting to him to see Mr. Bailey when mature producing such interesting and able Papers, which were of assistance to mining men.

There were two questions he wished to ask, for there had been so little criticism that he wished to introduce a note of discord. First of all, Mr. Bailey said the Report stated that a large part of the Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire area was only a few feet above sea level, and it was estimated that probably a total subsidence of 21 feet would take place on the working out of the underlying coal. He was curious to know how that figure of 21 feet was arrived at. From observations he himself had taken over a large part of Lancashire he found that with the fairly partial stowing of the long-wall workings there the subsidence was 50 per cent. Supposing it to be as bad as that, a subsidence of 21 feet would mean an extraction of 42 feet, and he did not think there was a total thickness of 42 feet of coal to extract there. There might be, but he should like to be advised on the point. Perhaps the author would look into it.

He was very glad Mr. Bailey mentioned the fact that the fundamental difficulty was the practical impossibility of getting any accurate knowledge of facts upon which it was possible to build up any reliable theory as to subsidence which could be applied generally. Mr. Leeder brought that out very well when he referred to the case of the running sand. As a matter of fact some people, and particularly the professorial element who taught mining (and he had been a professor himself for six years), were rather addicted to formulæ; they tried to arrive at a formula which would tell one what the subsidence was to be, its angle, and so on, in every case. It could not be done, because the superincumbent strata varied so enormously in depth, character, presence of faults, and so on, that it was impossible to arrive at a formula capable of universal application.

Considering that question, Mr. Bailey said from the surveyor's point of view the lack of reliable data made it impossible to decide definitely, inter alia, whether the damage had been caused by mine workings or by some other means, such as defective foundations. Personally he should have liked to see the question of pumping of water included. Quite apart from areas where coal or other minerals was worked, there had been in different parts of this country considerable subsidences, notably on the east coast of Durham, where heavy pumping from the magnesium limestone had taken place. He believed the subsidences there were worse than in many cases of colliery workings.

There was one slight error in the Paper to which he wished to draw attention, namely, where the author said the late Sir Arthur Markham in 1912 and 1913 investigated the subject of hydraulic stowage, and so on. He (the speaker) was at that time chairman of a Committee known as the Spontaneous Combustion in Mines Committee, of which Sir Arthur Markham was also a member. Sir Arthur decried the practical application of hydraulic stowage to prevent subsidences, and he therefore suggested to him that he ought to go to the Continent to see it being carried out there. Two days later he went off and rushed through Europe, visiting France, Westphalia, and Silesia, and came back exhausted, and somewhat converted, and nothing would suit him but that the matter should be gone into still more thoroughly. That was in the days before the war, and the opposite number of the chief inspector of mines in England, the chief engineer of mines in Germany, was induced to send one of his staff over; their staff, during certain months of the year, were allowed to undertake other work. The chief engineer sent over Herr Seidl, who investigated all the coalfields of Great Britain and reported to the Committee. Mr. de Seigfried, a late fellow-student of Mr. Bailey at the University of Birmingham, acted as interpreter, and the whole of Herr Seidl's conclusions in his very able report would be found in the Minutes of Evidence of the Committee named. To make a long story short, the only part of Great Britain where, with a few exceptions, such as the case of coal underlying towns, the process was at all practicable was in south Staffordshire, where there was a great thickness of coal and large quantities of material available on the spot for putting into the wastes.

It had been said that what really made that method practicable abroad was the immense supply, readily available, of sand and so on, and that was so. As Mr. Forster Brown said, it did not actually do away with subsidence, but reduced it to a negligible point, under 5 per cent. In Silesia, whether Polish or German Silesia he was uncertain, compressed air was used to achieve the same object—in one case, at any rate.

He thoroughly agreed with all that had been said as to the inadvisability of leaving pillars indiscriminately, because the pillar might form a fulcrum on which the superincumbent strata might act as a lever and cause irregular movement, so that the last state of the buildings above might be very much worse than if the coal had been worked out and the excavation well packed.

He knew nothing about houses, except that when they fell down through subsidence he was asked to give a reason for their having done so, but he was interested to learn the other day that one of the few buildings that withstood the earthquake in Tokio was the British Embassy, which was built by Americans on a raft of concrete. That seemed of some interest in connection with what had been said that evening.

He thoroughly agreed with Mr. Bailey's remarks under the heading of "Local Authorities." Like Mr. Bailey, he failed to understand why gas undertakings were not considered as well as canals.

He hoped that if the Government, acting on the Report of the Royal Commission, extended Part 2 of the Mines (Working Facilities) Act to canals and other undertakings, they would take a little more care than they did in the Mines (Working Facilities) Act in deciding as to the amount of coal to be left, and the angle that should be allowed in respect thereof, because the conclusions at which they arrived, and on which the figures in that Act were based, were in his opinion erroneous.

It gave him the greatest possible pleasure to support the vote of thanks. The Paper was of great interest, and of a kind which really did good. Many Papers did good; some did harm; but Mr. Bailey's Paper would do good; it made people think, and gave rise to an expression of their opinions which was desirable in order that right conclusions might be arrived at, for "In a multitude of counsellors there is "wisdom."

Mr. G. TURVILLE BROWN (Member of Council) said The Institution once paid him the compliment of asking him to read a Paper in the Hall of The Institution to welcome the mining engineers who were elected to The Institution under the dispensing powers of the Council. That was in 1916, and as a result of that Paper he had made many friends, so that he always looked back with great gratitude to the Council for having invited him to address The Institution on that occasion.

It was with great pleasure he supported the proposal that a hearty vote of thanks be accorded to Mr. Bailey for his most useful Paper, which followed on the equally interesting Paper Mr. Bailey read before The Institution in 1924. The Paper dealt with the two Reports of the Royal Commission, the first of which was on the Doncaster area, which, as everyone knew, was likely to be the most interesting from the point of view of having to deal with mining subsidence, and the second of which was the General Report published in June last.

With regard to Doncaster, he thought that was largely a question for arterial drainage engineers, working in conjunction with the very best mining experts that could be obtained. There was present that evening Mr. Clayton, the great friend of the late Mr. Grantham, and, it was to be hoped, his worthy successor. Mr. Clayton had been kind enough to bring with him a map which showed the whole of the Doncaster district with the collieries and the drainage areas, and he had been looking at that map with very great interest.

The questions which must arise in the mind of anyone who was at all acquainted with arterial drainage matters and subsidence questions were extremely interesting. For instance, the River Don ran roughly from west to east across that area. It was a question whether it would be cheaper to sacrifice the coal under that and leave it at its present height, or whether it would be more economical to take out the coal, raise the banks and pump up into the river. One had to pump, of course, from whatever area was brought below the level of gravitation drainage.

Sir Richard Redmayne had raised the point about sinking 21 feet. He thoroughly agreed with Sir Richard it was most unlikely that within the next 100 years any sinkage of that sort would occur; but of course the main point was that, if subsidence occurred to below the natural drainage level, pumping was necessary. The difference between pumping, say, 3 feet and pumping 15 feet was inconsiderable; in each case one had to put in the pumps and to work them.

With regard to the Doncaster area, he had been doing a great deal of work in the last two or three years for the Dutch people, and in connection with that work he had been in Amsterdam a good deal. A few months ago he was staying with some friends near Amsterdam, and they asked him to go to see what was being done on the Zuyder Zee, where the Dutch were reclaiming an area which eventually was to reach something over half a million acres, about 550,000 acres altogether, he believed. He could safely say the work required in the Doncaster area was a very small thing indeed compared with what the Dutch were doing on the Zuyder Zee, and he believed if the work was tackled now by arterial drainage engineers and mining engineers acting in collaboration it would be found to be not nearly so onerous as some people were inclined to imagine.

Turning to another subject, he was interested to hear a remark that fell from Mr. Forster Brown in regard to the relations between mining lessors and mining lessees in regard to the matter of mining subsidences. Before the Royal Commission Mr. Forster Brown or Mr. Parker Reece (or perhaps both of them, for their evidence was very much the same) mentioned that in 80 per cent. of the cases they knew of full liability in respect of subsidence was taken by the lessee and not by the lessor. Lately, however, he thought there had been a certain tendency the other way, and in some cases he knew of the lessor accepted, in addition to the current rate of royalty and the ordinary dead rents, a sum (either a tonnage sum or a sum calculated at a footage rate; he would not call it a rent) on the coal as the coal was worked, to clear the lessee of his liability for surface subsidence. He thought that was a thing to be encouraged, it was a good thing in many ways. It enabled the lessee (who after all, in times like the present, had to be given every consideration) to calculate his liability exactly in respect of surface subsidence, which was otherwise a rather difficult thing to do. It therefore seemed in the interests of public policy that arrangements of that kind should be encouraged, but there was this difficulty: The Inland Revenue claimed income tax on sums which were paid under a clause in the lease drawn in that way, and when income tax had to be paid on mining rent, it meant that mineral rights duty and welfare duty (each a shilling in the £) had to be paid on it and, where the owner had a large enough income to be affected, super tax also, so that the sinking fund which the owner would hope to take and invest as against the damage his surface might suffer was at the very best reduced by almost one-third and in the worst case by one-half, which was going to make a very considerable difference. In future leases he thought either the old arrangement would have to be reverted to, and the lessee expected to take the full liability for subsidence, or else some arrangement would have to be made by which any sinking fund reserved in a lease in that way would be clearly understood by the Revenue authorities not to be liable to income tax and all that income tax implied.

He had gone through the Paper very carefully, and had not anything to add to what Mr. Forster Brown and Sir Richard Redmayne had said; but he should like before sitting down to thank Mr. Bailey very much for what he had done, and to say that if anyone wanted a companion with whom to go on the Continent, he could thoroughly recommend Mr. Cecil Bailey. Two years ago he had the pleasure of going with Mr. Bailey to see the Dutch State mines. The Dutch Government, through their officials, received them with great courtesy and hospitality, and they had a very good time. His appreciation of that experience was very much heightened by his recollection of Mr. Bailey's jolly good fellowship, and he hoped they would both live to have another holiday of the same sort. He wished again to thank Mr. Bailey for his interesting Paper, which he was sure everyone had enjoyed.

Mr. C. H. SAMPLE, O.B.E. (Fellow), expressed his appreciation of the Paper, which had no doubt taken, he said, a good deal of time and work to prepare, and for which Mr. Bailey deserved the very best thanks of The Institution.

The first point to which he desired to call attention was the fact that the Commissioners confined themselves almost entirely to subsidence caused by the working of coal. There was, however, another substance worked from out of the earth which had been causing a great deal of subsidence lately, namely, brine. Sir Richard Redmayne had referred to the damage caused by the pumping of water. The pumping of brine was a still more serious matter, because the brine had to pay mineral rights duty, yet it was not scheduled as a mineral for purposes of compensation. That seemed to be very unfair.

At a meeting of the Land Agents' Society the other day cases of very serious damage in Lancashire and Cheshire were instanced, caused by brine pumping, and damage at a great distance from the site of the pumping station—4 or 5 miles in some cases. He himself had experience of damage by brine pumping in the county of Durham, but that was close to the pumping stations. He mentioned that because of the anomaly that mineral rights duty had to be paid, but there was no right to claim damages as in other cases of minerals.

With regard to that portion of the Commission's Report which had what Mr. Bailey called the "quality of uncertainty," he could fully support the word "uncertainty."

A short time ago he was called on, together with an eminent Fellow of The Institution, to assess the probable damage that would be caused during a 40 years' lease let to a mining company. The lease had already just expired, and the owner of the property—some 2,000 acres—wanted to have a sum fixed which would cover the damage he would have to suffer during the next 40 years. He thought anyone who knew anything about either mining or surface would say that was an impossible thing to do. And so it was, but they had, at the same time, to assess the damage caused by the expiring lease. That was all right, and gave something to go on. Eventually they arrived at a figure which was accepted by both parties, but of course it could not in any way be said that it was accurate.

The next point in the Commission's Report was the precautions suggested to mitigate damage. He was not qualified to go into the precautions which might be taken underground, but those which it was suggested might be taken above ground were divided under three heads, and all three meant adding some expense to the building. The extra expense in the case of the first two would probably not be considerable, but the third, building on a concrete raft, would add considerably to the cost. Last year he had occasion to build two new farmhouses on exactly the same plan at a cost of about £1,250, and, in consultation with the mining company, it was decided in one case to build a concrete raft. The difference in the cost of the two houses was £130, which meant an increase in price owing to the raft of roughly about 10 per cent. Of course in that case the surface-owner and the mineral-owner were one and the same, so that there was little difficulty; but in a case where the owner of the surface had no interest in the minerals, it seemed somewhat onerous that he should be asked to expend more money in building his houses simply because of the likelihood of trouble from the mines underneath, in which he had no interest.

The suggestion that local authorities should put something in their building bye-laws to make builders take those precautions would not, in his opinion, meet the case. It would practically mean stopping all private enterprise in building, because the houses would cost more than the builder could possibly recover for them.

With regard to the right to compensation granted to local authorities, that was a matter which he thought would have to be very carefully dealt with, because the composition of local authorities in the mining districts was—he hardly knew how to express it—very peculiar, and such powers as that given them might lead to serious abuse. But he certainly thought something should be done to enable builders and local councils, who were going to build, to get particulars of mining operations, although his experience both on district and county councils had been that when they were going to build to any extent they always employed a mining engineer to advise as to the likelihood or otherwise of any subsidence occurring. (He had always called it "subsidence," and was glad to find others took that view.) They had never found that the engineer employed by the council had any difficulty in getting information from the mining companies as to their workings.

The proposal to give right of support and compensation to houses of a rateable value of £40 and under was, he thought, a very dangerous one. It was very nice indeed for the builder and surface-owner to have such a prospect before them, but from the mining point of view it might create a very large expenditure and encourage builders to build on unsuitable ground, without making due inquiries, if they thought they would get compensation for any damage which occurred.

With regard to the statutory powers to be conferred on local authorities in respect of sewers, water, and so on, his own view was that the demand for water and sewerage had been created by the mining company owing to the influx of population which they had attracted; and as the mining company would be the largest ratepayers in the district, it would hardly be fair that they should pay for damage caused to water and sewage pipes. In any case the cost of the repairs would fall heaviest on them.

He thanked the author very much indeed for his Paper.

The vote of thanks was then put, and carried with acclamation.

Mr. Cecil H. Bailey, in reply, said he was very much obliged to the members for the way they had listened to his Paper, which was on a subject which might seem uninteresting to those who had had no experience of houses tumbling down. He would not go in detail into what had been said in the discussion, as that would take too long, and he wished to have an opportunity of reading what the various speakers had said; he would reply more fully in the Journal.

There were, however, one or two points he wished to mention. He agreed with Mr. Forster Brown as to the importance of discussing at The Institution reports such as those under consideration. One felt one's responsibility in raising such matters and discussing them within The Institution, because one hoped Parliament would take some notice of what was said by a body like The Surveyors' Institution before adopting in toto the recommendations made by a Commission.

On the whole he thought mining engineers and surveyors who had experience of the questions dealt with could say they supported the Reports whole-heartedly, but he was of opinion there was some doubt as to the wisdom of the suggestion to confer the right to compensation on houses of a rateable value of £40 or less. As he had already said, he had given some thought to the question of how the effect of that proposal might be ascertained, and he was unable to arrive at any result. The effect might be very serious for some people, but on the other hand it might not be a serious matter at all. It was extremely difficult to forecast what its effect would be.

He was very much obliged to Sir Richard Redmayne for what he had said. Personally he was not responsible for the figure of 21 feet, and, like Sir Richard, he did not know where the 21 feet was going to come from. It was mentioned in the Doncaster Report. One of the witnesses before the Commission referred to the fact there was an estimated prospective subsidence of 21 feet in the Doncaster area. Personally he did not believe it, and he was glad Sir Richard agreed with him. He must apologise with regard to Sir Arthur Markham. He used Sir Arthur's name because he knew Sir Arthur did go to the Continent at that time, and because Sir Arthur wrote to his father to say he had been to the Continent to investigate the matter, and that the cost would be as given in the Paper, and was therefore prohibitive. No doubt, as Sir Richard Redmayne had said, it was Herr Seidl who really did the work.

He was very much obliged to Mr. Turville Brown for what he had said; his reference to their journey to the Continent was highly appreciated.

He did not quite follow Mr. Sample's reference to brine pumping. As far as he understood it, brine pumping compensation had nothing to do with mineral rights duty. He understood from what Mr. Sample said that the houses damaged were some distance away, and probably not, therefore, in the area. Brine pumping compensation was paid for damage to houses in a particular area and was paid out of a special fund, not out of mineral rights duty.

Mr. Sample mentioned 10 per cent. as being the increased price due to a concrete raft. His own experience was that it was often a good deal more than that, but he agreed one could not contemplate with equanimity even a 10 per cent. rise in the cost of a house.

Reverting to the question of the 21-ft. subsidence in the Doncaster area, the Report stated: "It has been calculated "by Mr. Joseph Humble that the extraction of the minerals "would ultimately involve a fall in the surface levels of "21 feet." He remembered Mr. Humble gave evidence to that effect before the Commission, but he did not know where he got his evidence from; he did not think there was 21 feet to get out altogether.

It had been a great pleasure to him to prepare the Paper, and he had done so with a sense of responsibility, because he thought The Institution should discuss such questions before legislation was initiated by the Government.

The following written communication has been received from Mr. T. A. O'Donahue (Fellow) :—

We are again indebted to Mr. Cecil Bailey. This supplemental Paper is a useful commentary on the Reports of the Commission.

In one respect, however, it appears to me to be desirable to qualify his conclusions. His comments on the "quality "of uncertainty" are apt to be misunderstood, and may be a dis-service to the mining engineer. We are not dealing with an exact science, and it is useless to deplore the fact that the laws of subsidence cannot be laid down with mathematical accuracy. To give the impression that the mining engineer knows little or nothing of the laws of subsidence fails to do justice to the time and thought which has been given to the subject.

Mr. Bailey states that the "fundamental difficulty is the "practical impossibility of getting any accurate knowledge "of facts upon which it is possible to build any reliable "theory which can be applied in general."

I regard this as unfortunately worded. If "in general" were omitted from the sentence, I would say it was totally wrong.

As the upper strata of our coalfields are not a homogeneous body in a horizontal position, it follows that there must be some "quality of uncertainty" in forecasting breaking lines of strata. Mr. Bailey states, firstly, that it is "impossible to decide definitely whether subsidence damage "will take place if a mineral is worked." I maintain that the extent and amount of subsidence which will follow the working of a coal seam can be anticipated with a reasonable degree of accuracy in all but very exceptional cases. Further, the area where damage will arise at the edges of workings can reasonably be inferred. Obviously one would not be expected to say how many cottages will be fractured.

Similarly, on his second point, as to "which of two "adjacent workings has caused damage," I claim that on this, also, there is little difficulty in deciding in almost all cases if all the known facts are disclosed. Of course there may well be cases where both workings have contributed to the damage.

On the third point, as to "whether damage has been "caused by mine workings or by some other means, such as "defective foundation," there is seldom any difficulty.

There are few cases which should baffle the mining engineer who is in possession of all the known facts and who is free from prejudice.

This subject is talked about as if nothing were hitherto known about it. Mr. Joseph Dickenson laid down the laws fairly precisely in 1898,* and they have been confirmed by extensive observations in later years. There are differences of view as to the "critical angle," which must obviously vary with the hardness of the strata: but there is almost general agreement here and abroad as to general principles. No series of observations in this country support any contrary view.

Statutory effect is given to the general view in the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923. The negative results from the labours of the Subsidence Commission were due to sanctity of contract, and not lack of knowledge of the laws of subsidence.

The following is the written reply received from Mr. Cecil H. Bailey:—

I have now had an opportunity of reading the transcript of the note of the discussion which took place after my Paper read before The Institution.

In addition to what I said at the meeting I must add the following—

Mr. Leeder spoke about damage occurring subsequent to the working of the coal. This is a rather rare occurrence. The movement set up by the working of coal is more or less continuous. Its effect is felt on the surface some time after the working has started, and continues for some time after the working has stopped. The spaces made by the working become filled with broken débris, and after a time become consolidated, and no further movement takes place. If these old workings are disturbed at all, it is probably only by the withdrawal of water from or through them.

* Transactions, Manchester Geological Society, Vol. XXV.

Contrary to general opinion, miners practically never put supports of any kind underground with a view to minimising subsidence on the surface. Such supports as are put in are for the purpose of holding open the space immediately adjoining the unworked coal for the convenience of the work itself, and when no longer of use for that purpose they soon collapse and become part and parcel of the mass of consolidated débris which takes the place of coal which has been taken away.

For this reason "subsequent subsidence" is very unlikely to be caused by the collapse of timber.

The pumping of water from or through old workings sometimes causes fresh disturbance. I attempted in 1924 to describe my idea of the way in which this occurs. I do not believe that water per se is capable of forming a support. There is no legal remedy for damage caused by the withdrawal of water in the way described by Mr. Leeder.

The first case described by Mr. Leeder is very interesting, and is an example of the "quality of uncertainty."

With regard to the second case it is usual for a mining lessee's liability for damage to buildings to be limited to those existing at the date of the lease, and I should assume that unless it was so expressly limited the lessee would be liable also for damage to buildings subsequently erected. Mr. Leeder does not say what the terms of the covenant in the lease in question were, and I should rather like to look up the case and study it. Perhaps he would be good enough to give us the reference to it.

I am much obliged to Mr. Forster Brown and Sir Richard Redmayne for the support they give to me by their remarks. Their experience is, of course, far greater than mine, and my Paper is justified by the fact that it has led to the recording of their views.

Mr. Turville Brown had raised an interesting point in connection with the payment of income tax on the sum set aside for payment for surface damage. It is, of course, entirely wrong that any income tax should be paid on royalties at all which are recognised by law as not being income, but as payments for the capital value of the coal. While the nation, however, continues to live on its capital, which it is undoubtedly doing to-day, there is not much hope that the tax on royalties will be abated or cancelled.

It is as well, perhaps, to call Mr. Sample's attention to this question of tax, as he mentions that he has recently been engaged on assessing the value of future liability for surface damage.

I regret that Mr. O'Donahue appears to think that I have gone too far in emphasising the "quality of uncertainty," but it will be noticed that he bases his criticism on what my words might have been taken to mean if some of them had been omitted. I am well acquainted with the work which Mr. O'Donahue has done on the subject, and also with the writings of Mr. Joseph Dickenson. I also acknowledge the very great value of all this, but I am, at the same time, impressed with the impossibility of placing any real reliance in any particular case on predictions or conclusions resulting from them. If there is any difference of view between Mr. O'Donahue and myself, it is one of degree and not of kind.

I fail to agree, however, that the negative results were not due in some measure to lack of knowledge of the laws of subsidence. If the extent and amount of subsidence which will follow the working of a coal seam can be anticipated, then a law can be passed that no coal must be worked within a given distance of an adjoining property which is entitled to support. But it is just this impossibility of anticipation that prevents the law being defined beyond the general prohibition from removing your neighbour's support. Part II. of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, does not lay down the amount of coal which is required for support; the scale of distances there to be found is a pure compromise to be used in estimating the amount to be paid by the mineowner in case of damage.

Mr. Bailey made the following additions to his Paper :—

On page 63, after end of 3rd paragraph (". . . . into consideration")—

> "The Commissioners say in their Report that they went to several of the mining districts, and in particular to South Wales, where there had been many complaints of the state of affairs, and they found that the extent of the damage was very much less than what they had been lead to expect. What they mean by that I do not know, but it does accord with one's own experience in this, that, to put it colloquially, some of us were beginning to wonder what the shout was about. Mining subsidence does, of course, create very serious damage within certain small localities, but not over wide areas. A house may fall down here and there over an area of several miles, but so far as I know you will not find whole streets of houses tumbling down on any coalfield."

On page 66, at end—

> "That point of inspection is a very difficult question to deal with, but there is this to be borne in mind as regards statutory companies and local authorities : If a mineowner gives notice that he wishes to work coal —or any mineral, for that matter—under property owned by a local authority, the local authority then has the right to inspect his workings for any length of time. There should, however, be some further right to inspect plans, and that is a point I mentioned in my Paper in 1924."

Paper No. 511.

LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT, 1927.

By J. Leonard Crouch (Associate).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 6th February, 1928.

During the past few years the amount of legislation affecting land which has found its way to the Statute Book is enormous. Fortunately for most members of our Institution they are concerned with only a part of it; but that part is a large one. The latest Act, the Landlord and Tenant Act of 1927, is by no means the least insignificant addition.

This Act passed into law so recently as 22nd December last. The Bill as introduced was amended by Standing Committee, and after considerable, if not full, discussion in both Houses of Parliament it ultimately emerged much altered in some important respects.

It is well known that opinions upon the Bill varied considerably. In some quarters it was thought that it did not go far enough. In others, more particularly voiced perhaps in the House of Lords, it was thought that it went too far. Many of us probably held opinions one way or the other, and it may be that we hold those opinions still. But now that the Bill has passed and has become an Act, controversial matters of that description are necessarily out of place. As surveyors and lawyers we shall—or some of us will—I hope be called upon to assist in administering and applying the Act; and our present business for that purpose is confined to making ourselves acquainted with its provisions. I am by no means assured that the task is a simple one.

The main purpose of the Act, which comes into force on 25th March next (Section 26 (2)), is to provide for the payment of compensation for improvements and goodwill to tenants of premises used for business purposes. It may be remarked that the Act applies to England and Wales only (Section 26 (3)).

Much of the law of landlord and tenant with which we have been familiar is changed. The Act gives to certain tenants of business premises particular rights not hitherto enjoyed by them, and the first 17 sections forming Part I. set them out in detail. The next three sections, forming Part II., make general amendments to the law of landlord and tenant, and the remaining sections, 21 to 26, forming Part III., are general. They contain, however, the important provisions constituting the tribunal for the purposes of the first Part of the Act.

Finally there are three schedules.

PART I.

Sections 1—17.

It may seem at first sight a comparatively simple matter to provide for compensation for improvements and goodwill to be paid to tenants on the termination of their tenancies. A moment's consideration, however, is sufficient to dispel such a notion.

The length of the tenancy has a bearing upon the question; so too has the extent of the landlord's interest in the property. If he were always the freeholder, matters would be simplified. But he may be only a short leaseholder, and if the compensation were always payable by him alone, it might swamp or drown his interest and ruin him, leaving the tenant an unsecured creditor for the whole or part of the compensation. Both parties in such a case must, therefore, be protected as far as possible if the scheme of the Act is not to be defeated. Superior landlords naturally come into view. If they are to be brought to the rescue, their interests must be considered before liabilities are placed upon them, otherwise they too might share the fate of the immediate landlord and the tenant's interest might not be improved.

A further complication arises. What is the meaning of the expressions "improvements" and "goodwill"? What is an improvement through the eyes of the tenant might be waste through the eyes of the landlord. He could not be asked to pay for it unless in fact it was an improvement. Again, the improvement might have been executed under a contract with the landlord, and paid for by him either in cash or by accepting a lower rent; provision must be made whereby the landlord is not to pay for the same thing twice over.

If goodwill is to be paid for, is the tenant to be allowed to set up business elsewhere? If so, he may be placed in the enviable position of being paid for his cake and keeping it as well.

It is not difficult to multiply the number of such matters. To meet the difficulties which arise in connection with them is one of the purposes of the first Part of the Act. It remains to be seen hereafter whether its provisions meet all the unexpected circumstances which we know have an inveterate habit of happening.

Shortly, this Part of the Act enacts that the tenant is to be compensated for his improvements to the holding and for any goodwill attaching to the premises created by him and which he would lose on quitting, provided that, in each case, the holding is thereby increased in value. No further definition of either improvement or goodwill is given in that Act.

These two matters of compensation for improvements and compensation for goodwill are kept separate in the Act. In the former case the Act supposes that normally the landlord will pay in cash, but provides that, as an alternative, he can offer the tenant a renewal of the lease. In the case of goodwill the tenant can, in certain specified circumstances, demand a new lease.

The claim for compensation for improvements is dealt with in the first three sections of the Act.

The machinery by which the tenant is enabled to claim compensation quite shortly is this. Details will be given later as they appear in other places in the Act. The tenant first of all has to give notice to his landlord that he proposes to make an improvement. In the event of the landlord objecting, the tenant can apply to the tribunal, which can, in certain circumstances, certify that the improvement is a proper one. In that case, as well as where the landlord does not object, the tenant can proceed to execute the improvement.

The last formality which has to be observed is for the tenant to make a claim upon the landlord for compensation.

The draftsman of the Act had to commence somewhere, and perhaps the service of the claim on the landlord is as logical a place to commence as anywhere. At any rate that is where he commenced.

Section 1 (1) prescribes the times at which this claim must be made. In the case of a tenancy terminated by notice, the claim must be made within one month after the notice was served on or by the tenant (Section 1 (1) (a)); in any other case it must be made not more than 36 nor less than 12 months before the termination of the tenancy (Section 1 (1) (b)). It is important for the tenant to observe these times, as otherwise he will lose all rights under the Act. The claim is the first step in the proceedings for the recovery of the compensation. It will be a formal document, for it has to be "made in the prescribed "manner." "Prescribed" means prescribed by county court rules, except that in relation to proceedings before the High Court it means prescribed by rules of the Supreme Court (Section 25). These will, in due course, be included in the practice books. Surveyors, perhaps, have less interest in them than lawyers, who will probably in many cases draft the claims. Of this we may be sure, that the tenant will have to give the landlord full particulars so as to enable him to know precisely what it is that the tenant claims.

The date at which the tenant will be entitled to compensation is "at the termination of the tenancy on quitting "his holding" (Section 1 (1)). It is to be observed that both conditions are to be fulfilled. Should the tenant hold over, the compensation would not be recoverable until he quitted. He would not, I think, suffer more than the usual penalties for so doing. The Act does not mean that he is entitled to compensation only if he quits at the termination of the tenancy. It will, I think, be found that the words in the Act mean "not before" the occasion stated as in many cases the compensation may not have been ascertained "on the termination of the tenancy, and on "the tenant quitting his holding."

This sub-section tells us all that the Act has to say about the meaning of the word "improvement." It tells us that an improvement includes the erection of any building on the holding made by the tenant or his predecessor in title; not being a fixture he can by law remove, which adds to the letting value of the holding. But of course the inclusion of such a building does not exclude anything else. It is a question of fact to be decided by the tribunal what is an improvement, the only test of which is that it adds to the letting value of the holding. It is easily conceivable that certain work—decorations, unnecessary buildings, and so on—may in some circumstances constitute an improvement, and may not do so in others.

When the fact has been established that the improvement adds to the rental value of the holding, it becomes necessary to calculate its capital value, for it is of this that the tenant's compensation consists.

By the proviso to this section it is enacted that the compensation shall not exceed (a) the net addition to the value (that is, the capital value) of the holding, or (b) the reasonable cost of carrying out the improvement at the termination of the tenancy, subject to deductions for repairs, &c., which need not detain us.

It appears to me that the proviso does no more than place a maximum limit upon the capital value of the annual addition to the rental value; and it further so appears that the maximum value is not to exceed the lower of the two measures. The word "or" suggests that the word "either" is implied after the words "shall not exceed," which appear in the second line of the proviso.

Before passing from this proviso it may be important to notice the words in paragraph (a)—the net addition to the value of the holding "as a whole." It is apparently assumed, and probably rightly so, that there are holdings which might be let in parts but are actually let in one. The improvement to one part would not be compensatable unless the whole letting profited by it.

Sub-section (3) is noticeable for the power it gives to the tenant. If the parties fail to agree, all questions as to the right to compensation under Section 1, or as to the amount thereof, are to be determined by the tribunal. If the tribunal determines the matter in Sub-section (2), and determines that on account of the intention to demolish or alter, or to change the user of the premises—a change of word, probably without significance, from "holding" which is generally used—that no compensation or a reduced amount of compensation shall be paid, a further application "may "be made by the tenant if effect is not given to the intention "within such time as may be fixed by the tribunal."

Some provision should be made in any agreement between the parties which would enable the tenant to reopen the question of compensation if necessity arose in such circumstances as have been indicated. By so doing some difficulties in interpreting and applying the contracting-out Section (9), to be noticed hereafter, might be obviated.

Section 2 (1) sets out in four paragraphs the limitations "on a tenant's rights to compensation in certain cases."

(A) The Act is not retrospective in this; the tenant is given no rights to claim in respect of any improvement made before the commencement of the Act, the date of which is the 25th March next (Section 26 (2)).

(B) The tenant is not entitled to compensation in respect of any improvement made in pursuance of a statutory obligation, or of any improvement which the tenant or his predecessors in title were under an obligation to make in pursuance of a contract entered into, whether before or after the passing of this Act (not the date upon which it comes into operation) for valuable consideration, including a building lease. The inclusion of a building lease does not, of course, exclude other leases or other forms of contract. When once it is proved that the valuable consideration has passed, the Courts do not consider the amount of it—a detail too familiar, perhaps, to warrant mention. This rule of law, however, is subject to any statutory enactment, and it may be important to read Section 9 together with this paragraph. That section deals with contracting-out.

(c) The tenant is not entitled to compensation in respect of any improvement made less than three years before the termination of the tenancy.

(d) Finally, the tenant is not entitled to compensation if the landlord offers a renewal of the tenancy and the tenant declines the offer. The landlord, to comply with the Act, must, within two months of the tenant making the claim under Section 1 (1), serve on the tenant notice that he is willing and able to grant, or obtain, the renewal of the tenancy, at such rent and for such term as, failing agreement, the tribunal may consider reasonable. The tenant must accept the offer in writing and send it to the landlord within one month from the service of the landlord's notice. If he fails to do so, he loses his rights under the Act, for he is deemed to have declined the offer.

If (d) of this sub-section is to be applied with strict regard to its grammatical meaning, both the rent and the term are to be in blank. In such a case the tribunal might make each party pay its own costs. I cannot think that either party would be precluded from giving figures; in view of costs it might be worth while his doing so. It does not seem to be reasonable that the parties are to go to the tribunal without knowing each other's terms, nor would it be fair to the tribunal. The tribunal could, and doubtless would, require to know what each side offered to do.

Sub-section (2).—In the event of an adjudication by the tribunal, the rent fixed by it is to be one that a willing lessee other than the tenant would give and a willing lessor would accept, but irrespective of the value to be attributable to the improvement concerned. Otherwise the tenant would be paying interest on the value of his improvement, or, in other words, he would not receive any compensation for it.

By Sub-section (3) the tribunal is to "take into con-" sideration any benefits which the tenant or his predecessors "in title may have received from the landlord or his pre-" decessors in title in consideration expressly or impliedly "of the improvement," for it may be that it has been paid for already.

Section 3 deals with the landlord's rights to object to an improvement proposed to be made by the tenants. The whole section contains much important matter, and no excuse will be made for fully quoting the text.

Sub-section (1) enacts that—

> "Where a tenant of a holding to which this Part of the Act applies proposes to make an improvement on his holding, he shall serve on his landlord notice of his intention to make such improvement, together with a specification and plan showing the proposed improvement and the part of the existing premises affected thereby, and if the lordlord, within three months after the service of the notice, serves on the tenant notice of objection, the tenant may, in the prescribed manner, apply to the tribunal, and the tribunal may, after ascertaining that notice of such intention has been served upon any superior landlords interested and after giving such persons an opportunity of being heard, if satisfied that the improvement—
> (a) is of such a nature as to be calculated to add to the letting value of the holding at the termination of the tenancy, and
> (b) is reasonable and suitable to the character thereof, and
> (c) will not diminish the value of any other pro> perty belonging to the same landlord, or to any superior landlord from whom the immediate landlord of the tenant directly or indirectly holds, > and after making such modifications (if any) in the specification or plan as the tribunal thinks fit, or imposing such other conditions as the tribunal may think reasonable, certify in the prescribed manner that the improvement is a proper improvement:

> Provided that, if the landlord proves that he has offered to execute the improvement himself in consideration of a reasonable increase of rent, or of such increase of rent as the tribunal may determine, the tribunal shall not give a certificate under this section unless it is subsequently shown to the satisfaction of the tribunal that the landlord has failed to carry out his undertaking."

Sub-section (2) is as follows:—

> " In considering whether the improvement is reasonable and suitable to the character of the holding, the tribunal shall have regard to any evidence brought before it by the landlord or any superior landlord (but not any other person) that the improvement is calculated to injure the amenity or convenience of the neighbourhood."

This sub-section means, I take it, that the tribunal is not to hear any evidence except that brought by the landlord or any superior landlord, not the evidence only of the landlord or superior landlord. Without such a restriction there might not, in certain conceivable circumstances, be an end to the number of neighbours who might desire to explain how much injury would be caused to them by the proposed improvement. At the same time this sub-section does not seem to set any limitation on the number of witnesses to fact whom the landlord or superior landlord may call. The number of expert witnesses who can be called is dealt with in a later section (21 (4)).

Sub-section (3) reads as follows :—

> "The tenant shall, at the request of any superior landlord, or at the request of the tribunal, supply such copies of the plans and specifications of the proposed improvement as may be required."

Sub-section (4) reads :—

> "Where no such notice of objection as aforesaid to a proposed improvement has been served within the time allowed by this section, or where the tribunal has certified an improvement to be a proper improvement, it shall be lawful for the tenant as against the immediate and any superior landlord to execute the improvement according to the plan and specification served on the landlord, or according to such plan and specification as modified by the tribunal or by agreement between the tenant and the landlord or landlords affected, anything in any lease of the premises to the contrary notwithstanding :
> Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall authorise a tenant to execute an improvement in contravention of any restriction created or imposed—
> (a) for naval, military or air force purposes ;
> (b) for civil aviation purposes under the powers of the Air Navigation Act, 1920 ;
> (c) for securing any rights of the public over the foreshore or bed of the sea.

Sub-section (5) specifies certain matters which are essential to be observed, or the tenant will forfeit all rights to compensation. Without disturbing the words of the sub-section, I have ventured to number these matters in order to emphasise them. Their importance is obvious.

A tenant shall not be entitled to claim compensation under this Part of the Act in respect of any improvement unless—

(1) he has, or his predecessors in title have, served

notice of the proposal to make the improvement under this section,

(2) and (in case the landlord has served notice of objection thereto) the improvement has been certified by the tribunal to be a proper improvement,

(3) and the tenant has complied with the conditions, if any, imposed by the tribunal,

(4) nor unless the improvement is completed within such time after service on the landlord of the notice of the proposed improvement as may be agreed between the tenant and the landlord, or may be fixed by the tribunal ; " and then follows the following passage which would appear to be not quite in the right place :

> " and where proceedings have been taken before the tribunal the tribunal may defer making any order as to costs until the expiration of the time so fixed for the completion of the improvement."

Sub-section (6) refers to a detail. A tenant can require his landlord to give a certificate that the improvement has been executed on payment of reasonable costs.

This section should be read in conjunction with Section 9, which refers to restrictions on contracting out of the Act, to which reference will be made in the appropriate place. Subject to that, this section applies to all leases including those existing at the date when the Act comes into operation —that is, 25th March next. Apparently the only cases in which the tenant will not be able to obtain compensation will be under those leases which will expire before the tenant can give the necessary notices, execute the improvement, and make his claim. There certainly may be such leases. It will not be forgotten that an improvement does not come within the Act unless it is made after the commencement of the Act.

This concludes the sections of the Act dealing particularly with the tenant's claim for compensation for improvements. The sections which follow deal with the claim for goodwill. It will be seen that they differ materially from those relating to improvements. The procedure is different, due to the different character of the subject-matter; but the greatest difference, at any rate as I see it, lies in the degree of difficulty in arriving at the proper sum to be awarded to the tenant by way of compensation.

No definition of "goodwill" is provided by the Act. It has probably never been comprehensively defined. When the Bill was in the House of Lords, Lord Carson said that one dictionary said that Lord Eldon had described goodwill as "the chance of retaining customers," and thought it impossible to value such a thing unless conditions were laid down. Lord Reading, however, was perhaps nearer the heart of the matter when he said that while it was a difficult thing to define, nobody could doubt its general meaning, and there was a market for goodwill in a business. With this we shall all, or many of us will, concur, and we can proceed on our way with an understanding of what goodwill is, with or without definitions or conditions.

Under Section 4 (1) the tenant must make a claim in the same way and at similar times as in the case of improvements, and is entitled to be paid on a similar occasion.

The tenant being the claimant is, of course, in the position of plaintiff in an ordinary action, and bears the onus of proof. He has to prove that he has or his predecessors in title have carried on the business for a period of not less than five years. It will be observed that nothing is specially said concerning the date at which the period of five years ends. Perhaps it can be ascertained in this way; The tenant has to satisfy the tribunal that by reason of the carrying on a trade or business for a period of five years, goodwill has become attached to the premises. That would seem to indicate that the latest date is the date of the hearing by the tribunal.

No definition of "trade or business" is given beyond that contained in Section 17 (3), which is in the negative.

It says that premises shall not be deemed to be used for carrying on thereat a trade or business (a) by reason of their being used for the purpose of carrying on thereat any profession; (b) by reason that the tenant thereof carries on the business of sub-letting the premises as residential flats, whether or not the provision of meals or any other service for the occupants of the flats is undertaken by the tenant.

No one doubts that certain occupations are trades or businesses, nor that certain occupations are professions; whether there is a defined border-line between them is another matter altogether. I am not aware of any legal judgment or even dictum which can be regarded as comprehensive. There have been innumerable cases where the word "trade" has had to be construed with its context. Thus, a lunatic asylum was held not to be included in a lease prohibiting the carrying on of any "offensive trade," the word "trade" in such a connection being applicable only to a business of buying and selling (Doe d. Wetherell v. Bird [1883], 6 C. & P., 195). But it may include manufactures (Commissioners of Taxation v. Kirk [1900], A.C., 588 P.C). The matter is summarised in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. XXVII., at page 509, thus:—

> "'Trade' in its primary meaning is the exchanging of goods for goods or goods for money, and in a secondary meaning it is any business carried on with a view to profit, whether manual or mercantile, as distinguished from the liberal arts or learned professions and from agriculture. The word, however, is one of very general application, and must always be considered with the context with which it is used. Thus, under the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, a solicitor, or a farmer, or a baker, or a coach proprietor, is not a tradesman, but a horse-dealer is; and as used in various Revenue Acts the word 'trade' is not limited to buying and selling, but may include manufacture."

At page 511 it is said that "'business' is a wider term, "not synonymous with 'trade,' and means practically any"thing which is an occupation as distinguished from a "pleasure."

Long lists of authorities are quoted to which it is not my intention to refer. There can be, I think, but a very small minority of occupations which cannot be placed in the categories on the one hand of trades or businesses, and on the other hand of professions.

When it is remembered that the Act applies to a limited number only of possible instances, the minority referred to shrinks to insignificant proportions. The prospect of costly litigation over the meaning of the words is lamentably remote.

It is not for the whole of the goodwill that the tenant can claim compensation, but that part only which attaches "to the premises by reason whereof the premises could be "let at a higher rent than they would have realised had no "such goodwill attached thereto" (Section 4 (1)).

There does not appear to be any difficulty in construing these words. It is for the tenant to prove his case, and his task is to show as a fact the amount of the increased rental value. A layman in such matters may, I hope, be permitted to express the opinion that the task does not appear to be a very light one.

There is a lengthy proviso to this Sub-section (1) (a) of Section 4. The first paragraph (a) sets a limit upon the amount of compensation awardable. It is not to exceed such addition to the value (that is, the capital value) of the holding at the termination of the tenancy as may be determined to be the direct result of carrying on the trade or business by the tenant or his predecessors in title.

The only comment I desire to make consists in underlining the word "direct." It is clearly intended to be antithetical to "indirect," and adds an element, whatever the effect may be, to be considered in valuing the attaching goodwill.

The paragraph continues: ". . . . in determining such "addition the tribunal shall, if it is proved that the premises "will be demolished wholly or partially, or used for a different or more profitable purpose, have regard to the effect of " such demolition or change of user on the value of the good-" will to the landlord." By way of parenthesis, please observe that the words " more profitable purpose " are defined in Sub-section (2). They refer to rent only.

In ordinary law actions the defendant is obliged to deliver a statement of defence in answer to the statement of claim. By the time the hearing is reached the point at issue is generally clearly defined, and everyone knows what it is, and can prepare the evidence accordingly. There is nothing, so far as I can see, in this Act prescribing anything in the nature of the defence in ordinary pleadings. But the sub-section now under consideration suggests that the tenant ought to know, before the hearing, what the landlord proposes to do with his premises. The knowledge might be of paramount importance to him, and it is to be hoped that the forthcoming rules of court will provide him with the necessary means of obtaining it.

The next paragraph (b) of this proviso is Section 4 (1). It is an important paragraph, and reads as follows :—

> " The tenant shall not be entitled to compensation in respect of such goodwill if within two months after the making of the claim the landlord serves on the tenant notice that he is willing and able to grant to the tenant, or obtain the grant to him of a renewal of, the tenancy of the premises at which the trade or business is carried on at such rent and for such term not exceeding fourteen years as, failing agreement, the tribunal may consider reasonable; and if the tenant does not within one month from the service of the notice send to the landlord an acceptance in writing of the offer, the tenant shall be deemed to have declined the offer."

The refusal by the tenant of the offer of the landlord puts an end to all claim to compensation. He is not given the choice between cash and lease. It behoves the tenant to signify his acceptance within the period allowed him.

Paragraph (c) concerns licensed premises. The sum payable as compensation for goodwill is not to include any addition to the value of the premises attributable to the fact that the premises are licensed premises.

This is not to say that the tenant is not to receive compensation at all. The paragraph clearly indicates that he may receive it.

Paragraph (d) contains directions to the tribunal to regard certain matters and to disregard others. It is to have regard to the intentions of the tenant as to carrying on trade or business elsewhere, and may make it a condition in the award that the tenant shall undertake not to carry on the trade within a certain specified distance of the premises.

This is a common condition in the ordinary sale of a goodwill of a business, and the remedy for a breach of it presents no difficulty. It would be an injunction to restrain with or without damages.

I am not sure how the landlord in advance of the hearing is to ascertain the intentions of the tenant. The rules of court will presumably help the landlord to that end, either by interrogatories or otherwise, or possibly it may be considered that ignorance of the tenant's intentions would not affect the landlord's valuation, and knowledge of them at the hearing would be sufficient. It is a matter, if left until then, which should be brought out by the landlord or his representatives.

The tribunal, under (ii.) (d) of Section 4 (1) is to disregard any value which is attributable exclusively to the situation of the premises.

The situation could not be a matter which depended upon the tenant. It would seem to be unnecessary to refer to it.

Paragraph (e) throws upon the landlord what seems, if he undertakes it, to be a difficult task. Where the landlord proves that the value of the goodwill has been created or increased owing to restrictions imposed by the landlord, whether by agreement with the tenant or not, upon the letting for a competitive trade or business of other premises in the neighbourhood owned by or under the control of the landlord, the tribunal shall have regard thereto and may refuse the application for compensation or may award a reduced amount of compensation.

Paragraph (f) provides that no compensation shall be payable if the tenant has determined the tenancy or failed to exercise an option for a further term, unless, in the case of an option, the terms are such that the tenant could not reasonably be expected to exercise it.

The word "reasonable" is frequently used in statutes and deeds; but it has been said that it would be unreasonable to expect a definition of the word "reasonable." "Reasonableness belongeth to the knowledge of the law "and therefore to be decided by the justices" (Co. Litt., 56 B). It is for the tribunal to decide whether the option was reasonable or not. If it was not, the tenant may claim compensation.

By paragraph (g), where tenants of any Government department, or a local authority, or a charity, or a statutory or public utility company have, in pursuance of the powers contained in the lease, terminated the lease by resuming possession of the premises for the purpose of the department or any other Government department, or of the authority, or of the charity, or of the undertaking of the company, or where premises the tenancy whereof has expired by effluxion of time are required for any such purpose, no compensation shall be payable under this section.

Sub-section (3) enacts that where an offer of a renewal of a tenancy by the landlord under this section is accepted by the tenant, the rent fixed by the tribunal is to be the rent as between a willing lessee (other than the tenant) and a willing lessor, having regard to the terms of the lease. Clearly no regard must be paid to the value of the goodwill. The tenant would still be enjoying the benefit of it if he remained, and the renewed tenancy is in substitution of compensation.

By Sub-section (4), in the absence of agreement between the parties, all questions as to compensation and the amount of it shall be determined by the tribunal.

Two comments upon this section may be made.

The Act seems to contemplate that the parties will in general invoke the aid of the tribunal. Agreement between the parties is, of course, not lost sight of, but where there are several superior landlords whose concurrence is necessary, and doubtless in many other cases, it may very likely be found that the tribunal will afford the readiest means of settlement.

When the tenant has been granted a new lease or renewal of the old lease under this section, it is still open to him at the proper time to make a further claim for compensation in respect of goodwill attaching to the holding created during the term of such new lease or renewal. He posseses no rights beyond this Act (Section 5 (8)).

Section 5.—In certain circumstances the tenant is given rights to a new lease in lieu of money compensation. It is not a general right, but only arises in a combination of circumstances. Firstly, it must be proved that a money payment could not compensate the tenant for the loss of goodwill; and, secondly, that it would not be unfair to the landlord to grant a new lease.

Sub-section (1) lays down the procedure by which the tenant is to bring the matter before the tribunal. The first step is to serve the landlord with a notice, within the time allowed for making a claim under Section 4, requiring him to grant a new lease. By Sub-section (2), after service of this notice, either the landlord or tenant within specified times can make an application to the tribunal.

Sub-section (2).—The tribunal has then to decide whether the grant of a new tenancy is, in all the circumstances, reasonable. In the event of its deciding in the affirmative, it may, subject to the other conditions mentioned, order the grant of a new tenancy for a period not exceeding 14 years. The other terms of the lease are in the power of the tribunal as it may determine to be proper. If the tribunal is precluded, on any of the grounds to be enumerated directly, from making the order, the tribunal may award such compensation as is provided under Section 4. Thus, under this section the tenant can bring his case before the tribunal under Section 4. It must be remembered, however, that the tribunal has power to award costs, and this is a consideration to be observed in deciding under which section to move the tribunal.

The rent payable under the new tenancy is to be fixed by the tribunal as through the eyes of a willing lessor and a willing lessee other than the tenant, but, of course, irrespective of any goodwill at all.

Sub-section (3).—Where the tenant applies to the tribunal, the grant of a new lease shall not be deemed to be reasonable unless the tenant proves three things. He must satisfy the tribunal that he is a suitable tenant; that he would be entitled to compensation under Section 4, and that the sum which could be awarded him under that section would not compensate him for the loss he would suffer if he removed to and carried on his trade or business in other premises.

It would, no doubt, depend upon the facts of the case whether or not the tenant's onus of proof is a difficult one. But it is his onus and not the landlord's; and if the tenant fails to satisfy the tribunal upon any of the three conditions, he will not get the new lease. The third condition would in most cases probably be the principal stumbling-block. The compensation which could be awarded is dealt with in Section 4, and is, no doubt, to be calculated by the tribunal fairly readily; in what circumstances the compensation could not be sufficient may present a stiffer problem. It is, however, a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the tribunal. The Act affords no assistance upon the point.

But suppose that the tenant satisfies the tribunal upon the three conditions, the landlord has then something to say. A new lease is not to be granted if the landlord proves any of the following:—

"(b) (i) that the premises are required for occupation "by himself, or, where the landlord is an individual, for "occupation by a son or daughter of his over 18 years of "age."

This I take to mean a substantial part of the premises.

There is not, I think, any significance to be attached to the substitution of the word "premises" for "holding," although the latter word is the subject of definition in Section 17. The word "premises" forms part of the definition of "holding."

Next in order of matters which, if the landlord proves them, the new lease will not be granted are—

(ii.) that he intends to pull down or remodel the premises—that is, I submit, substantially remodel the premises—a question of fact for the tribunal to decide;

(iii.) that vacant possession of the premises is required in order to carry out a scheme of redevelopment;

(iv.) that for any other reason the grant of such a lease of the premises would not be consistent with good estate management, and for this purpose regard shall be had to the development of any other property of the same landlord.

On failure of the landlord to satisfy the tribunal it may grant the new lease. If, however, the tribunal refuses to do so on any of the grounds enumerated (under (b)), it is given power to make it a condition of refusal that if the landlord fails to carry out his intention within a certain period the landlord shall pay compensation to the tenant. Such compensation must not exceed the amount of the loss which the tenant has suffered by reason of having been deprived of his right to the grant of a new lease under this section.

These last words, I think, introduce a further consideration. They appear to me to mean this: The compensation referred to is not to become payable before the landlord shall have failed to observe the conditions imposed by the tribunal. Upon the landlord's failure to observe the conditions, the tribunal will proceed to assess the compensation.

It is necessary to observe the measure of the compensation. The amount is not to exceed the amount of the loss which the tenant has suffered by reason of having been deprived of his right to the grant of a new lease.

This is obviously a penalty. It does not mean merely that the compensation under Section 4 is to be payable, for, if such were the meaning and it was paid whether the landlord carried out the conditions or not, there would be no necessity to impose any condition. It must mean a further liability which is to be ascertained on the basis of the tenant's total loss which might include the whole value of the goodwill and not merely that part of it which attaches to the premises, plus any further loss the tribunal considers proper.

Sub-section (4) provides for the case where the landlord requires the premises for the same reasons as above not immediately but at some future period. The new lease is to be granted for a term not exceeding such period, unless the lease is made subject to a condition that the landlord may, at any time after the expiration of that period on giving not less than six months' notice, resume possession of the premises.

This is subject to the tenant's rights to make a further claim under the new lease. His claim, however, if he makes one, cannot be made under this section. He must proceed under Section 4. This is laid down in Sub-section (8) of Section 5. But even so, he will have no claim to any compensation except for such goodwill as has been created during the term of the new lease or renewal. He has no claim to a new lease or the renewal of the old one; and it is to be observed that the landlord is not under any penalty if at the termination of the new lease, for however short the period may be, he fails to carry out his intentions.

This appears to me to be the combined effect of the sections and sub-sections mentioned.

Sub-section (5) gives the landlord rights to apply to the tribunal for power to re-enter after the expiration of 7 years of the lease granted under this section on the ground that the premises are required for carrying out a scheme of redevelopment. If such re-entry is given, the compensation payable to the tenant will be the value of the unexpired term of the lease.

Sub-section (6).—In the case of Government departments, local and public authorities, and public utility companies, the lease may contain a covenant to re-enter on giving 6 months' notice.

Sub-section (7) provides an alternative to the grant of a new lease. The landlord can offer to sell his interest in the premises to the tenant. The offer is to take the form that, failing agreement, the consideration may be determined by the tribunal, and the duration of the landlord's interest is in the opinion of the tribunal adequate. Similar language occurs in Section 2 (1) (d), and involves similar difficulties as were referred to.

If the tribunal so determines, the whole or part of the consideration may be in the form of a terminable rent-charge for such amount and of such duration not exceeding the duration of the landlord's interest as the tribunal may fix.

It is perhaps hardly necessary to say that there is no power in the tribunal to order this alternative. But no doubt when once the offer is accepted and the aid of the tribunal has been invoked, unless the matter is withdrawn by consent, any order of the tribunal would bind both parties.

It is to be noticed that by Sub-section (8) no claim for a new lease under this section can be made in respect of goodwill during the term of a new lease granted upon proof that money compensation could not meet the case.

Sub-sections (9) to (13) seem to speak for themselves; and as comments appear to be unnecessary, their effect may be summarised as follows:—

Sub-section (9).—Where the immediate landlord is a mesne landlord—"landlord" in this section includes any superior landlord affected by the order of the tribunal—the tenant need only serve his immediate landlord, who, if a mesne landlord, must send a copy of the notice to his immediate landlord, and so on. Penalties can be inflicted for failure to do so.

Sub-section (10) says that an order for a new lease is binding on both landlord and tenant.

Sub-section (11).—A new lease may exceed the length of the landlord's lease, and provision is made for the purpose.

Sub-section (12).—The landlord may require that the new lease is to contain a similar covenant as in the original lease against carrying on a trade and doing any act, provided that he has not consented to a variation.

Sub-section (13).—The tribunal may by order enable the tenant to hold over if proceedings cannot be completed before the expiration of the tenancy if the delay is not due to the default of the tenant.

Section 6 introduces, although only in a side-note, a phrase made familiar by the Rent Restriction Acts, namely, "alternative accommodation."

The landlord is given the right to offer the tenant alternative accommodation instead of paying compensation. If the landlord serves the tenant with a notice that he is willing to grant at such a rent and for such a term as the tribunal considers reasonable a tenancy of other premises which also, in the opinion of the tribunal, would reasonably preserve to the tenant the goodwill of his business, the tenant shall not be entitled to compensation.

This section raises the same point with reference to the form of the offer as in Section 2 (1) (d).*

Section 7 makes provision for a case where the tenant claims for both improvement and goodwill. If the landlord offers a renewal of the tenancy, the rent is to be fixed irrespective of any increased value to the premises attributable whether to the improvements or goodwill.

Section 8 deals with the common case of tenancies of leasehold property with intermediate landlords. By Sub-section (1) a mesne landlord who is liable to pay compensation for improvements or goodwill is entitled at the end of his term to compensation from his immediate landlord as if he had himself made the improvement or created the goodwill. He must serve on his immediate superior landlord copies of all documents relating to proposed improvements and claims which have been sent to him in pursuance of the first Part of the Act. In the event of two or more landlords not agreeing as to whether an offer of the renewal of the tenancy in lieu of compensation for an improvement or goodwill should be made, the matter is to be referred to the tribunal for determination.

* See page 106, ante.

Section 9.—The language of this section which deals with contracting out of Part I. of the Act is not happy, and is unusual.

The intention apparently is rather to regulate than to prohibit contracting out. The section commences with the words "This Part of this Act shall apply notwithstanding "any contract to the contrary."

If the section stopped there there would be an end to all doubt. But unfortunately there is a comma, followed by the words "being a contract made at any time after the "eighth day of February, nineteen hundred and twenty-"seven."

The passage seems to say that such a contract made on or before this date is valid, and I think that is its meaning.

Then follows a proviso having reference to contracting out subsequently to 8th February, 1927, the effect of which is, I suggest, that if the tribunal thinks that the contract deprives the tenant of any right to compensation for improvements or goodwill but gives him adequate consideration for the deprivation, the tribunal is to confirm the contract, otherwise the contract is invalid. The actual words are: "Provided that, if on the hearing of a claim or "application under this Part of this Act it appears to the "tribunal that a contract made after such date as aforesaid, "so far as it deprives any person of any right under this "Part of this Act, was made for adequate consideration, "the tribunal shall, in determining the latter, give effect "thereto."

Section 10 gives a landlord the right to enter the holding for the purpose of executing any improvement he has undertaken to execute and of making requisite inspection.

Section 11 enables the landlord to deduct from the compensation payable by him any sum due from the tenant in respect of the tenancy, and enables the tenant to deduct from any sum due to the landlord in respect of the tenancy any sum payable by the landlord for compensation.

It may be doubted whether any sum for compensation is payable under the Act until the amount of it has been ascertained as prescribed.

Section 12 has reference to charging orders. Section 20 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, as modified in the First Schedule of Landlord and Tenant Act, is to apply. The landlord is entitled to obtain from the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries an order charging the holding with repayment of compensation paid for an improvement or goodwill, together with costs and charges, with interest, and by instalments, as the Minister thinks fit. Where the landlord is not an absolute owner, no instalment or interest is payable after the time when the improvement or goodwill will have become exhausted.

There are other provisions in the First Schedule to which reference may be made when the occasion to do so arises. They are framed to meet exceptional cases.

Section 13 gives power to apply and raise capital money under the Settled Land Act, 1925, in payment of money expended and costs incurred by a landlord in the execution of an improvement.

Sections 14 and 15 refer to power to sell or grant leases notwithstanding restrictions, and make provisions as to reversionary leases.

Section 16 deals with the landlord's right to reimbursement of increased taxes, rates, and insurance premiums. Where the landlord is liable to pay any taxes (not by deduction from rent) or rates (including water rate) in respect of a holding, or has undertaken to pay the fire insurance premiums, and in consequence of any improvement executed by the tenant whereby the assessment of the premises or the rate of premium is increased, the tenant becomes liable to pay to the landlord sums equal to the amount by which the taxes or rates and premiums are thus increased. The sums so payable by the tenant are recoverable as rent.

Section 17 (1) supplies the definition of "holdings" to which reference is so frequently made. They consist of any premises held under a lease, other than a mining lease, made before or after the commencement of the Act, and used wholly or partly for carrying on thereat any trade or business, and not being agricultural holdings within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. Sub-section (2) enacts that the first Part of the Act shall not apply to any holding let to a tenant as the holder of any office, appointment or employment from the landlord.

Sub-section (3) must be quoted in full. It reads:—

> "For the purposes of this section premises shall not be deemed to be premises used for carrying on thereat a trade or business—(a) by reason of their being used for the purpose of carrying on thereat any profession; (b) by reason that the tenant thereof carries on the business of sub-letting the premises as residential flats, whether or not the provision of meals or any other service for the occupants of the flats is undertaken by the tenant, provided that, so far as this Part of this Act relates to improvements, premises regularly used for carrying on a profession shall be deemed to be premises used for carrying on a trade or business."

This proviso should be noted. It has no reference to goodwill, as will be seen; but it means that, for the purposes of a claim for improvements only, a profession becomes a trade or business, but it must be regularly carried on upon the premises, whatever that somewhat indefinite expression may be held to mean.

Sub-section (4).—"In the case of premises used partly "for purposes of a trade or business and partly for other "purposes, this Part of the Act shall apply to improvements "only if and so far as they are improvements in relation to "the trade or business."

Let me ask some questions upon this sub-section. How would a professional member of this Institution go to work who was instructed to value such an improvement? Would he ask to see profit and loss accounts from which to draw the conclusion whether the improvements have relation to trade or business, or would he inspect the premises and regard as improvements only those which had been made on the trade portion of the premises? And if the premises were not differentiated between trade or business and "other purposes," what then?

I confess that these concluding words of Part I. of the Act seem somewhat difficult of application, but I am happy to think that the law seems to be clearly expressed.

PART II.

General Amendments to the Law of Landlord and Tenant.

Alterations, both considerable and important, are made in the law of landlord and tenant.

Section 18 (1).—The first alteration concerns the ordinary covenant or agreement to keep or put the premises in repair during the lease, and the covenant to surrender in repair at the termination of the lease. It matters not whether the covenant or agreement is expressed or implied, general or specific. In no case are damages for breach of it to exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished owing to a breach of such covenant or agreement as aforesaid.

It is understood that this measure of damages is declaratory only. But the next words effect a great change. No damage shall be recovered for a breach of the agreement to leave or put premises in repair at the end of the lease if it is shown that the premises, in whatever state of repair they might be, would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down, or such structural alterations made therein as would render valueless the repairs covered by the covenant or agreement.

The general meaning is plain enough; the landlord is not to say "although the repairs are valueless, I claim to be paid the cost of fulfilling the contract." For this is what the covenant has hitherto been held to mean. But I find considerable difficulty in seeing how the tenant could show that the premises were going to be pulled down at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy. The breach of the surrendering covenant only arises when the lease expires, and the landlord's remedy is an action at law. The tenant's defence would have to be an allegation of fact that the premises were to be pulled down or structurally altered so as to bring him within this section of the Act.

In some circumstances there might not be much difficulty. In cases where the landlord has only a few days' reversion, and it is known and can be proved that the freeholders are going to rebuild—the recent instance of the rebuilding of Regent Street will occur to everyone—the evidence would doubtless be procurable. But there must be a great many instances where no such evidence is available. Does it not come to this: that everything depends upon the intention of the landlord? It is not necessary to labour the difficulties that beset the path of the tenant in such circumstances.

Sub-section (2) is to be read as one with Section 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

Under that Act, before action, a notice specifying the breach complained of, requiring the lessee to remedy the breach and to make compensation, has to be served on the lessee, and the lessee fails within a reasonable time to remedy the breach and to make compensation.

The present Act makes it necessary for the lessor to prove the service of the notice was known to the lessee, or to an under-lessee, or to the person who last paid the rent either on his own behalf or as agent for the lessee or under-lessee, and that the reasonably sufficient time in which to do the repairs is to date from the time when the fact of the service of the notice came to the knowledge of any such person.

The notice may be sent by registered post and shall be deemed to have been duly delivered unless the contrary is proved.

The section is retrospective, for by Sub-section (3) it is enacted that it "applies whether the lease was created "before or after the commencement of this Act."

By Section 19 (1) certain matters are to be read into leases (except those mentioned hereafter) made before or after the commencement of the Act. Such leases are those which contain a covenant against assigning, underletting, charging or parting with the possession of demised premises or any part thereof without licence or consent. Such covenant shall, notwithstanding any express provision to the contrary, be deemed to be subject—

(a) to a proviso that such licence or consent is not to be unreasonably withheld; and

(b) (if the lease if for more than 40 years and is made in consideration wholly or partially of the erection or the substantial improvement, addition or alteration of buildings, and the lessor is not a Government department or local or public authority, or a statutory or public utility company) to a proviso to the effect that in the case of any assignment, under-letting, charging or parting with the possession (whether by the holders of the lease or any under-tenant whether immediate or not) effected more than seven years before the end of the term no consent or licence shall be required, if notice in writing of the transaction is given to the lessor within six months after the transaction is effected.

It will be noticed that this proviso is, in the leases specified, additional to the former one. In the event of the lessor not receiving the six months' notice in time, consent would, I think, have to be asked under (a), and then consent could not be unreasonably withheld.

If the case was one in which consent could be reasonably withheld, the right of the landlord to re-enter would not apparently be affected.

Sub-section (2) reads as follows :—

> "In all leases, whether made before or after the commencement of this Act, containing a covenant condition or agreement against the making of improvements without licence or consent, such covenant, condition or agreement shall be deemed, notwithstanding any express provision to the contrary, to be subject to a proviso that such licence or consent is not to be unreasonably withheld; but this proviso does not preclude the right to require as a condition of such licence or consent the payment of a reasonable sum in respect of any damage to or diminution in the value of the premises or any neighbouring premises belonging to the landlord, and of any legal or other expenses properly incurred in connection with such licence or consent, nor, in the case of an improvement which does not add to the letting value of the holding, does it preclude the right to require as a condition of such licence or consent, where such a requirement would be reasonable, an undertaking on the part of the tenant to reinstate the premises in the condition in which they were before the improvement was executed."

> "In all leases whether made before or after the commencement of this Act containing a covenant, condition or agreement against the alteration of the user of the demised premises, without licence or consent, such covenant, condition or agreement shall, if the alteration does not involve any structural alteration of the premises, be deemed, notwithstanding any express provision to the contrary, to be subject to a proviso that no fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine, whether by way of increase of rent or otherwise, shall be payable for or in respect of such licence or consent; but this proviso does not preclude the right of the landlord to > require payment of a reasonable sum in respect of any damage to or diminution in the value of the premises or any neighbouring premises belonging to him and of any legal or other expenses incurred in connection with such licence or consent.

> Where a dispute as to the reasonableness of any such sum has been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, the landlord shall be bound to grant the licence or consent on payment of the sum so determined to be reasonable."

Sub-section (4).—This section does not apply to leases within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, nor does paragraph (b) of Sub-section (1), Sub-section (2) and Sub-section (3) of this section apply to mining leases.

I do not think it necessary to occupy your time over Section 20. It refers to apportionment of rents under the Inclosure Act of 1854.

PART III.

General.

Part III. of the Act, although headed "General," contains Section 21, by which the much-debated question of the tribunal is settled. The county court has been chosen by Parliament to act in the capacity, subject to transfer to the High Court. By Section 21 (1) the particular county court will be that in which the premises or any part of them are situated. It will doubtless happen occasionally that the parties will have a choice between two county courts.

In two circumstances the High Court will be the tribunal, (a) if, before commencing proceedings in the county court, the claimant or applicant and all persons affected agree that the claim of application should be heard by the High Court; and (b) if on an application being made to the High Court within the prescribed time the matter is transferred to the High Court in accordance with and subject to the provision of Section 126 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

With regard to (a), the High Court rules which are to be issued will no doubt state the prescribed time and all else that is necessary to be known.

"All persons affected" may involve some difficulty of definition and otherwise, but assuming that they agree, the High Court shall be the tribunal in respect of the matter.

With regard to (b), the section of the County Courts Act referred to enables the High Court to order the removal, if it deems it desirable so to do, upon such terms as to payment of costs, giving security, or otherwise as the High Court shall think fit to impose.

The Court has an absolute discretion in the matter (Challis v. Watson [1913], 1 K.B., 547). It is for the applicant to convince the Court that the removal is desirable (Donkin v. Pearson [1911], 2 K.B., 412). The usual grounds upon which the removal is ordered are that difficult questions of law may be involved (R. v. Williams [1851], 7 Ex., 51; Longbottom v. Longbottom [1853], 8 Ex., 203).

The general scheme of the whole section is this: a panel of referees is to be appointed by a special committee set up for the purpose entitled "the Reference Committee." From this panel will be chosen one member to whom the matter will be referred for inquiry and report. Everything is subject to this; any matter which, under the Act, is to be determined by the tribunal can, by Sub-section (8) of this section, by agreement be referred to arbitration under the Arbitration Act of 1889. Such an agreement may be contained in the original lease.

Sub-section (2).—Where proceedings are commenced and remain in the county court, the matter shall be referred, unless the parties otherwise agree, or it is otherwise prescribed, for inquiry and report to such one of the panel of referees as may be selected by the county court, as if with consent of the parties the matter had been referred to him under Section 6 of the County Courts Act, 1919.

The effect of that section is as follows: On referring the matter to the referee for inquiry and report, the county court judge may direct how such reference shall be conducted, and may remit any report for further inquiry and report. On consideration of any report or further report, the judge may give such judgment or make such order as may be just, without prejudice to any right of appeal.

Sub-section (3).—The referee is to be chosen by the registrar of the county court, unless any of the parties object. If there is such an objection, the judge is to make the selection.

Sub-section (4) places a limit upon the number of expert witnesses. Not more than one on either side shall be heard unless, and this is to be noticed, the referee or the judge of the county court otherwise directs.

By Sub-section (5) county court rules may be made for regulating various and by no means unimportant matters. Amongst them are the following: to enable any party to apply for directions as to the conduct of a reference. No details will be available until the rules are issued, but if they take the ordinary form of an order for directions in the High Court, they will deal with pleadings and the time of their delivery, particulars which, if ordered, must be delivered within certain times, admissions, discovery, interrogatories, inspection of documents, place and mode of hearing, and other matters necessary in the circumstances.

The rules may fix the remuneration of referees, and may provide for costs.

Sub-section (6) enacts that the Reference Committee shall consist of the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Master of the Rolls, the President of the Law Society, and our own President. The Committee have power to appoint such persons as they think fit to be members of the panel of referees, either generally or for particular localities, and to remove from the panel any person so appointed.

Under Sub-section (7) rules may be made by a High Court regulating proceedings commenced in or transferred to the High Court. A summons for directions is contemplated. On hearing it the Court or judge may, without any application being made, order the matter to be referred for inquiry and report to a referee selected from the panel. The Court may give such directions as it may think fit to give. The referee selected shall be deemed to be a special referee within the meaning of Section 88 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. That section enables the Court to refer to a referee for inquiry or report any question arising in any cause or matter, with an exception irrelevant here. The report may be adopted wholly or partially by the Court, and if so adopted may be enforced as a judgment or order to the same effect.

It is thus that the referee is not the final judge. The responsibility for the ultimate decision rests with the Court.

By Section 22 is given power to extend any period fixed or allowed by it for the doing of any act or thing. Application for such extension can be made by any party in the proceedings either before or after the expiration of the period so fixed or allowed.

It will be seen that there is no power under this section to extend times prescribed by the Act itself.

Section 23 (1) makes it obligatory to make any notice, request, demand or other instrument under the Act in writing. It may be served either personally or by leaving it for him at the last known address in England or Wales (only), or by sending it by registered post addressed to him there; or in the case of a local or public authority or a statutory or a public utility company, to the secretary or other proper official at the principal office of such authority or company, and, in the case of a notice to the landlord, the person on whom it is to be served shall include any agent of the landlord duly authorised in that behalf.

Sub-section (2).—If a tenant of a holding has received notice that the person theretofore entitled to the rents and profits of the holding (i.e., "the original landlord") has ceased to be so entitled, and also notice of the name and address of the person who has become entitled to such rents and profits, any claim, notice, report, demand, or other instrument which the tenant shall serve or deliver to the original landlord shall be deemed to have been served upon or delivered to the landlord of such holding.

By Section 24 (1) the Act applies to land belonging to

His Majesty in right of the Crown or the Duchy of Lancaster, and to land belonging to the Duchy of Cornwall, and to land belonging to any Government department. For that purpose the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, relating to Crown and Duchy lands, as set out and adapted in Part I. of the Second Schedule of the Act, shall have effect.

Sub-section (2) provides that the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, with respect to the application of that Act to ecclesiastical and charity lands, as set out and adapted in Part II. of the Second Schedule to this (the Landlord and Tenant) Act, shall apply.

Sub-section (3) refers to incumbents of a benefice. Virtually I think it comes to this: that for the purposes of the Act the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are placed in the position of landlords in substitution of the incumbent.

Sub-section (4) says that where land is vested in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands in trust for any charity, the trustees of the charity shall be deemed to be the landlord.

Section 25 (1) is the interpretation clause. It must be given in full:—

> "For the purposes of this Act, unless the context otherwise requires—
> The expression "tenant" means any person entitled in possession to the holding under any contract of tenancy, whether the interest of such tenant was acquired by original contract, assignment, operation of law or otherwise;
> The expression "landlord" means any person who under a lease is, as between himself and the tenant or other lessee, for the time being entitled to the rents and profits of the demised premises payable under the lease;
> The expression "predecessor in title" in relation to a tenant or landlord means any person through whom the tenant or landlord has derived title, whether by assignment, by will, by intestacy, or by operation of law;

The expression "lease" means a lease, under-lease or other tenancy, assignment operating as a lease or under-lease, or an agreement for such lease, under-lease tenancy, or assignment;

The expression "mining lease" means a lease for any mining purpose or purposes connected therewith, and "mining purposes" include the sinking and searching for, winning, working, getting, making merchantable, smelting or otherwise converting or working for the purposes of any manufacture, carrying away, and disposing of mines and materials, in or under land, and the erection of buildings, and the execution of engineering and other works suitable for those purposes;

The expression "term of years absolute" has the same meaning as in the Law of Property Act, 1925;

The expression "statutory company" means any company constituted by or under an Act of Parliament to construct, work or carry on any gas, water, electricity, tramway hydraulic power, dock, canal or railway undertaking; and the expression "public utility company" means any company within the meaning of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, or a society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Acts, 1893 to 1913, carrying on any such undertaking;

The expression "prescribed" means prescribed by County Court Rules, except that, in relation to proceedings before the High Court, it means precribed by rules of the Supreme Court.

(2) The designation of landlord and tenant shall continue to apply to the parties until the conclusion of any proceedings taken under or in pursuance of this Act in respect of compensation.

By way of postscript, the chief difficulties in the Act appear to me to be its application to any particular set of facts. This is not to say that difficulties may not arise in the interpretation of the Act. They probably will, or the Act would be almost a unique exception. But it does appear to me, if such a comment is permissible, that, in view of the subject-matter of the Act, the draftsmanship leaves singularly little to be desired.

A DISCUSSION took place on

THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT, 1927.

Mr. E. S. Cox (President) in the Chair.

Mr. J. Leonard Crouch (Associate), in introducing his Paper, said it was now over 35 years since he became a student of The Surveyors' Institution. Some years later he abandoned the profession of surveyor for the less auriferous occupation of a barrister-at-law. Incidentally there could not be a better training ground for the law than membership of The Surveyors' Institution. It had been his privilege for many years now to set certain examination papers and to examine the answers, and he could not help being struck forcibly by the legal instinct which was implanted in many of The Institution students. Later on they would be able to turn that instinct to good use, and he hoped when the time came and some of the students whom he had examined went into practice, they would look back with no unkindly feeling on the man who at least on one occasion might have ploughed them.

That night he was, he supposed, to be torn to pieces for having ventured to express some views on the new Landlord and Tenant Act. He had deliberately abstained from making any reference to the surveyor's duty or the referee's duty which would be cast on members of The Institution in due time. He had tried to approach the subject purely from the legal aspect, but it would be recognised that the Act was a new one, and until that Act had been interpreted by the Courts one did not know very much about it. All that one could do was to express an opinion. He had not hesitated to express opinions where he had thought that they would be of service, but what he gave were his opinions and nothing more.

The Act was one of extreme interest. It closely affected a vast number of people in this country, and it was essential not only that professional people should understand the Act but that it should be understood by the public at large.

To his mind the subject had been a very tiresome one for the draughtsmen to tackle. They were dealing with alterations in the common law of the land, i.e., the law founded on custom, because that was the basis of our common law. Subject to one or two matters, it seemed to him the Act had been well drawn, but in one respect he was in a difficulty. He did not follow Section 18 (1), which was with reference to the general amendments of the law of landlord and tenant in Part II. of the Act, and he would like to take the opportunity of adding a few words to what he had said in his Paper with regard to that sub-section. The first sentence in Section 18 (1) ran as follows:—

> "Damages for a breach of a covenant or agreement to keep or put premises in repair during the currency of a lease, or to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, whether such covenant or agreement is expressed or implied, and whether general or specific, shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished owing to the breach of such covenant or agreement as aforesaid."

The meaning of that sentence turned upon the words "(the value of) the reversion (whether immediate or not)."

Hitherto, during the currency of a lease, the damages for breach of a covenant to repair had been measured by the injury to the lessor's reversion. Was this the reversion referred to? The word "reversion" was commonly applied alike to an under-lessor's reversion and to the freeholder's reversion. Was the latter the reversion referred to? Which, if either, of those reversions was the one meant could be decided only by a competent tribunal, which might be the House of Lords.

Until such decision was given, he would refrain from offering any definite conclusion as to whether either or both were meant. The Act afforded no clue, for there was no definition of "reversion" in it.

A simple example would show how matters worked out: A, a freeholder, let a piece of land to B on a 99 years' building lease. B erected a building, and let it for 20 years to C with repairing covenants in his lease. On the expiration of C's lease it was found that no repairs had been done. To do them would cost £200, and unless that sum were expended on the building it could not be re-let.

There was difficulty in thinking that the Act meant B's reversion for it was always an immediate reversion, and the words "whether immediate or not" seemed not to point to it. Intermediate reversions could not be immediate, so the alternative "immediate or not"—if it was an alternative—would seem not to point to them either.

On the other hand, if it was the freeholder's reversion which was intended, the position in which B might be placed would be manifestly unjust, for the result would be that C would only be liable to pay an amount not exceeding the diminished value of that reversion. If the reversion fell in in 80 years' time, the £200 deferred till then might be worth practically nothing now—and that was all that B could recover. He did not think that the Court would read the Act as referring to the freeholder's reversion if, by some other construction, such injustice could be avoided. If the freeholder's reversion alone was meant, there would have been no difficulty in the Act saying so; a doubt was necessarily raised by the introduction of what was, so far as he had been able to ascertain, a new phrase.

If the lessor's reversion was meant, the words "whether "immediate or not" would be surplusage. It was not impossible, perhaps, that the draughtsmen of the Act meant those words to convey the idea that it mattered not whether the lessor's reversion fell in immediately or not. Whether the Court would so construe them was another matter entirely.

The intention of the section was presumably to prevent landlords from profiteering in dilapidations. But, it might result, according to the way in which the Act was read, in penalising a landlord who had made no attempt to profiteer.

It had been stated by a high authority that the Law of Property Act, 1925, might be understood in 25 years' time provided that an amending Act was passed in each intervening year. It was to be hoped that that section of the Landlord and Tenant Act would be understood before then. It must be remembered that the Courts would interpret the Act only with regard to the facts of the particular case before it. Thus a comprehensive interpretation of the section might be deferred for some time to come.

So far as he knew that was the only cryptic section in the Act, and he would frankly say he did not understand it. He had made many endeavours in the Temple to find someone who could tell him what those words meant, but so far he had not discovered anybody who had ventured to say it was 100 to 1 his opinion was right.

Mr. C. Gerald Eve (Member of Council) said it was his privilege to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Crouch for the trouble and care he had been to in preparing his Paper, and making the very interesting introductory remarks to which the meeting had listened with much pleasure. Mr. Crouch appeared to be of opinion that a meeting of The Institution might be compared to a den of lions, in which he was to be pulled to pieces; but as surveyors he was sure that members did not propose to embark on any pronouncements as to what the Act meant, especially as Mr. Crouch had taken considerable care not to come down on one side of the fence or the other until the problem had been solved a little by walking.

There were one or two questions which he would like to discuss. First of all, however, he wished to say how much he appreciated Mr. Crouch's Paper, and how very kind it was of him to present it, and to make dry bones live in the way he had done. Surveyors were suffering from indigestion through trying to consume and understand too many Acts of Parliament, and the Landlord and Tenant Act was another such Act. In spite of the further attack of indigestion it would inevitably give them it was their duty to try and master it, and therefore they could not but appreciate Mr. Crouch's efforts in making the subject so interesting.

First of all, one could not but be pleased to see that Crown properties were bound by the Act. He would not say more than that, except that no one could say the Crown were the best landlords in the kingdom.

On a point of law—and all lawyers would say there was nothing surveyors liked better than to explain the law to them—Mr. Crouch said that if a landlord said "No, I will "not give a renewal because my son or daughter, over 18 "years of age, wishes to occupy the premises," that meant a substantial part of the premises. The definition of "holdings" in Section 17 (1) was "the holdings to which this Part of "this Act applies are any premises." The words were not "include any premises" or "mean any premises," but

" are any premises," and therefore he suggested the word " holdings " and the word " premises " were indistinguishable and had the same meaning.

But if one looked at Section 16 one would find it said that where the landlord was liable to pay any taxes or insurance premium, &c., " in respect of any premises comprised in a holding," such and such things would happen. In that case Mr. Crouch won ! He would only say it was obvious the words " holding " and " premises " which were used alternatively at will in the Act were likely to be the cause of litigation. If Mr. Crouch could throw any further light on whether premises and holdings were different, each from the other, he would earn the gratitude of surveyors.

Then Mr. Crouch said—and he thoroughly agreed with him—that under Section 4 (1) (d), where one was valuing goodwill, one had to " disregard any value which is attributable exclusively to the situation of the premises." Personally he thought that section was not only unnecessary but regrettable, because it would confuse people's minds. If one was to value goodwill excluding any value attributable to the situation, it did not help the surveyor in the least; it confused his mind.

Goodwill consisted of three elements. One was the resort goodwill, namely, the kind of goodwill which ordinarily attached by reason of its position apart from the special personality or special efforts of the occupier. That was attributable to the site. Then came what he would call personal goodwill, which was again divisible into two elements, namely, the personal goodwill which remained attached to the premises when the tenant left, but the measure of which depended on the future action of the leaving tenant, as to whether he set up opposite or next door or retired from business, and the other portion of the personal goodwill, which was what inevitably disappeared from the property with the tenant, and which he might carry away with him or drop on his way away.

Now, it was the middle element which was the subject of compensation, namely, the personal goodwill which the tenant left behind on the premises, and which he did not carry away, or which was not lost on his way away. That was the subject of compensation.

There was a difficulty in Section 5 (5) for valuers. That was a case where a tenant said "I want a renewal of "the lease instead of a cheque for my goodwill that I leave "behind." If he got through the tribunal a lease instead of a cheque for his goodwill, then the Act said there should be inserted in the lease "If the landlord so requires, a "condition that the landlord after 7 years can resume "at 12 months' notice," and then the landlord had to pay the tenant whom he turned out "the value of the unexpired "residue of the term of the lease." The Act did not say the value to whom; it did not say whether it was the value of the unexpired residue to the tenant or the value of the unexpired residue to the landlord. Personally he thought it was probably the former, and that it was probable that the value did not include any trade profit of the tenant. In other words, he thought all that was meant was the capitalised value for the unexpired term of the profit rental, which of course, was a difference rental, and was the difference between the rent the tenant was paying and the rent he could get. The rent he was paying would be the rent excluding improvements and goodwill value. He thought those words were difficult and would mean litigation.

Then Mr. Crouch quoted with regard to licensed premises Section 4 (1)(c): "In the case of licensed premises the sum "payable as compensation for goodwill shall not include "any addition to the value of the premises attributable "to the fact that the premises are licensed premises." Mr. Crouch went on to point out that was not to say that the tenant of licensed premises was not to have compensation; indeed, Mr. Crouch said he was to have it. There, as a valuer, he ventured to suggest the tenant would not get it. If one read the section carefully, one would see it practically said that the licensee of licensed premises need not bother to claim compensation for goodwill.

As to the burning question of the arbitration tribunal, of course the lawyers had had their time in the House of Lords, and had made their attempt in the House of Commons, whereas the surveyors were represented in both the Lords and the Commons by only one surveyor, Sir Philip Pilditch, who had told him that the Bill was called the "Surveyors' "Relief Bill," but that personally he thought it should be termed the "Lawyers' Relief Bill."

The arbitration tribunal had been altered from surveyors to a tribunal which started in the county court. If one looked at the end of the Act—Section 21 (8)—one would find that that section was, at any rate to his mind, one of the most comfortable sections in the Act from the point of view of the ordinary citizen. It said: "Nothing in "this Act shall prevent an agreement being made for "referring to arbitration under the Arbitration Act, 1889, "any matter which under this Act is to be determined "by the tribunal." The meaning of that was obvious. If one had an enormous property in Regent Street, where thousands of pounds were at stake and matters of law were at issue, no one better than the surveyor realised that the proper organ to try questions of law and difficult questions of fact was the Law Courts. On the other hand, if one had quite a small matter where the question at stake was simply what a fair rent was or the value of an improvement or the value of goodwill, it was far easier to bring a trained surveyor to the property than to bring the property, by way of a picture, before the Law Courts by means of counsel, solicitors, and expert witnesses. Surveyors had often had occasion to say that if only the judge could be brought to look at a property, he would soon make up his mind without great quantities of expert evidence. Small matters would not stand the expense of very much law, or, indeed, of very much surveying, and in small cases where very little law was involved, if it were put in the lease "that any dispute under "this Act shall be referred to arbitration within the meaning of Section 21 (8) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, "1927," the tribunal would not come in. On the other hand, if it was an important lease and an important case, no one appreciated more the advantage of having the case tried by the Courts of England than a surveyor, because all agreed the Courts of England were the greatest buffer that existed to-day between the ordinary citizen and the various local authorities, Government departments, and so on. In other words, in the Courts of England one got justice, but it was expensive to bring the picture of a property before a judge, and it was cheaper to bring a surveyor to see the property if the case was a simple one.

English surveyors had another grievance against Scotland in that the Act did not apply to Scotland, and their Scottish colleagues would not, therefore, suffer from indigestion on account of it.

The Act had been sometimes described as a Bill for the compensation of tenants, allowing them compensation for goodwill and improvements. He did not think that was the proper way to put it. Personally he thought the correct description was that it was a Bill to make landlords pay in the future for what they had got free in the past, namely, the leavings of a quitting tenant. He believed that described the Act exactly. It was a mistake for tenants to think they would get compensation for all they had done. Landlords would have to pay, however, for any benefits the leaving tenant left behind which formerly the landlord got free. The Act was therefore a just one.

He thought the Act was a good one, moreover, because it remedied the main defects and injustices of the leasehold system. If those injustices were remedied, it would prevent the more drastic remedy of leasehold enfranchisement, which, as every surveyor knew, spelt disaster for landlord and tenant. It was admitted that there were injustices in the leasehold system, and the Act was a bold, wise and courageous attempt to remedy them; and unless they were remedied, leasehold enfranchisement would undoubtedly come. He therefore welcomed the Act.

He did not intend to go all through the Act, but he would like to point out that, as Mr. Crouch so well pointed out, the Act was "necessarily complicated." If a client came to a surveyor and asked him to explain in a few words how the Act affected the question of improvements, he thought the surveyor could not very well put the matter more shortly than as follows:—

"'Any tenant (whether weekly, monthly, yearly, or holding for a term, and whether by parol or written agreement, and whether his tenancy was created before or after the passing of this Act)'—so far he would merely have described 'any tenant'—'of trade or business premises, or premises regularly used for carrying on a profession (excluding mining leases, agricultural holdings, service occupations if granted before 25th March, 1928, as well as those created after that date if the agreement is in writing and expresses the purpose of the tenancy)'—so far he would merely have described the tenancy—'can claim for all improvements and new buildings if erected with the consent of the landlord or tribunal and if erected after 25th March, 1928, and not less than three years before the termination of the tenancy, if erected by him or the previous tenants from whom he derives his title to the tenancy (but excluding the improvements he or they contracted before or after the passing of this Act, to execute for valuable consideration, and excluding also trade fixtures legally removed by him)'—so far he had dealt merely with the subject-matter of compensation—'his compensation would be diminished by many factors, in some cases down to vanishing point, depending mainly (a) on what the landlord is going physically to do to the property, and to what kind of trader he will re-let the premises; (b) whether the tenant, after 8th February, 1927, contracted out of compensation for adequate consideration; (c) his claim will disappear in toto if he refuses a renewal of his tenancy at a rent and term agreeable to the parties or fixed by the tribunal. If he takes a renewal, the improvements cannot be carried forward for compensation at the end of the renewal lease, but he can at the end of the second lease claim for fresh improvements made during such renewal lease; any claim for such latter improvements could again be extinguished by the landlord again offering a second renewal, and so on.'"

He was not criticising the Act at all, because the complications were necessary, but he ventured to suggest that what he had said constituted a summary of the provisions of the Act as to improvements, which was as short as it was possible to make it. He urged that every surveyor should make up his mind, in order to remain a credit to The Surveyors' Institution, to study the Act thoroughly, so that when he got his first case under it he would be able to perform his duty with full credit to himself.

In conclusion, he would like again to say how very much the members of The Institution appreciated Mr. Crouch's Paper. It would be impertinent on his part to criticise anything Mr. Crouch had said, but he had ventured to suggest, for the sake of eliciting information, that "holdings" were "premises." It gave him great pleasure to propose a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Crouch for his excellent and intellectual Paper.

Mr. SYDNEY A. SMITH (Fellow) said it gave him very great pleasure to second the vote of thanks to Mr. Crouch for his Paper. He was certain the members of The Institution would find that what had been written by Mr. Crouch was of the greatest possible value when they came to deal with the many problems which were likely to arise and come before them under the Act. The Paper was very complete indeed and left no part of the Act untouched, so that surveyors might with confidence turn up the pages of the Journal when any question of the Act was involved.

He felt he could hardly agree with Mr. Crouch's statement that the draughtsmanship in the Act left little to be desired. He had read the Act several times, and some of its sections a great many times, and he felt that, at any rate from the surveyor's point of view, the draughtsmanship left a very great deal to be desired. Possibly Mr. Crouch was speaking from the lawyer's standpoint.

Personally he had never heard a more satisfactory précis of the Act than that which Mr. Eve had just given. He would suggest that every student who was going to sit for the next examination should turn up the report of that précis and learn it by heart, because there was very little doubt it would be asked for!

The Act had come about as the result of agitation which had been before the country for a great many years. It was very much to be hoped that now the subject had had considerable ventilation in Parliament and in the press, the code which had been provided would prove to be a code which landlords and tenants alike would be prepared to accept and to work under, and that in future, for some while at any rate, there would be a cessation of the complaints which had so often been heard in the past.

As Mr. Eve had rightly said, the Act was not an unjust Act. It did not require the landlord to pay for anything except what he was to receive. There were, however, disadvantages about it from the landlord's point of view. The landlord would often have to pay compensation for improvements and for goodwill before he knew whether he could get a corresponding return from his tenant. Indeed, there might be cases where suggestions for compensation under both those heads would be still under review while the negotiations were in hand for new tenancies, and in practice that might be extremely troublesome.

It was very interesting to contrast the provisions as to payment for improvements which were enacted for the tenant under Section 1 and for the landlord under Section 3 (1). Where a tenant desired to make an improvement to property, he had to give notice to the landlord and obtain the landlord's consent. If the work was carried out with the consent of the landlord or under the orders of the tribunal, the measure of compensation on quitting was the net addition to the value of the holding as a whole, or the fair cost of the improvement, whichever might be less. But if the landlord elected to carry out the improvement at his own cost, he might charge a "reasonable rent." Although this was perhaps not so good an example as might be found, he had in mind a case of premises occupied by a furniture dealer in a main street. The entrance was in the centre, and on one side was the shop, and on the other side a blank wall. The proposal was to put a shop front in the blank wall, and the cost would be about £150; but the addition to the rental value would be about £50 a year. If that improvement was effected by the tenant, the tenant's compensation would be restricted to £150, but if the landlord elected to do the work, it was possible he might be entitled to claim £50 a year.

That example showed the necessity for considering with very great care what the phrasing of the Act meant. Personally he would not care to express an opinion as to whether £50 would be a "reasonable rent" within the meaning of the Act or not, because it obviously included value due to situation; an outlay of £150 would not bring in a return of £50 a year everywhere, but it might if the situation enabled it to do so. The landlord might claim the tenant had no interest in the situation, but, on the other hand, the tenant might reasonably argue that such benefit as arose from situation was his for the period of the lease. At any rate it led to the conclusion that where the rental value was likely to be high compared with the cost, landlords might be wise to elect to carry out the improvement themselves. That was a practical point which should be borne in mind.

He thought that also illustrated the point that in estimating the value of improvements at any time there was risk that the general appreciation in value might become included in the value due to the improvement. It might be very difficult to dissociate the two, and there might often be very subtle distinctions between what was strictly due to the improvement and what arose from situation or general appreciation in value.

Another practical point for landlords to consider, now that the Bill had become an Act, arose in connection with the renewal of leases. If a lease was renewed under Section 4 or Section 5, it was renewed for a term—14 years or less—and that was the end of that particular tenant's right of renewal. If, however, landlords voluntarily renewed leases, apart from the Act, it would seem that to the new leases would be attached the rights under Sections 4 and 5, which rather lead one to the conclusion that landlords to-day should, perhaps, not renew leases except under the Act, so as to obtain finality so far as the right of renewal was concerned.

Mr. Eve had referred to Section 5 (5), which enabled landlords to require the insertion, in any lease which the tenant compelled, of a clause that after the seventh year the landlord might obtain possession with the consent of the tribunal at a year's notice. He ventured to suggest that that was something which landlords with adjoining property might always do, because it cost nothing; and if it was not done, there was no right of determination at all, whereas with such a clause there was at least the right of determination even if it had to be paid for.

Another important point under the Act was the position of landlords who were themselves leaseholders. A landlord who himself had a term of only 4 or 5 years to run was just as liable to pay compensation for the value of improvements based on their value in perpetuity as was a freeholder. The leasehold landlord had the same right when his lease ran out to recover equivalent value or what value might still remain at the end of his lease; but the right to compensation for improvements and for goodwill was liable to be lost in certain eventualities, as, for example, if the premises were to be demolished. A leasehold landlord of that type might therefore find himself in an awkward position in certain circumstances; he might pay for the goodwill and for improvements on a basis of perpetuity, but lose all right to compensation himself at the end of his term by reason of the fact that the landlord would then decide to demolish.

That was, however, only the position of any tenant after all. Any tenant might go to much trouble and expense to get the consent of the landlord or an order from the tribunal, only to find when the time for claiming money arrived that the landlord intended to demolish, or that on some other ground he had no right to receive it.

The Act imposed a heavy risk on leasehold landlords by Section 5 (8), by which a leasehold landlord who omitted to pass on the notice to his own lessor was liable to his tenant if as a result the tenant was unable to secure the renewal of his lease for the full term. That might be a heavy responsibility, because a tenant might be paying a rent of only £100 a year, or some figure like that, and yet be earning profits of £1,000 or £2,000 a year. So far as he could see, the loss for which the tenant would be entitled to claim would include the loss of those profits. There was nothing optional about it; the wording of the section was that the lessor shall compensate for the loss.

There was another penalty for landlords under Section 5 (3) (b), which provided that where a landlord for certain grounds persuaded a tribunal not to grant the lease, and then failed to carry out—for example, the development that he stated he intended to carry out—the tribunal might order compensation to be paid.

It would seem that a tenant, to secure those rights, must go to a tribunal. It was highly desirable, however, that landlords and tenants should make their own bargains apart from the tribunal, but it seemed that where a lessor refused a lease, if the lessor accepted the refusal he had no remedy under Section 5 (3) (b).

He thought that, as valuers, surveyors would have to consider what effect the Act was likely to have on the valuation of property. It was perfectly obvious the rights of reversion would be entirely different from what they were, and possibly values might be altered. What he could not make up his mind about was whether rents were going to be more or less stablised at to-day's figures, or whether there would be an enhancement from time to time in the value of rents of business premises in the future as there had been in the past. If the Act had the effect of eliminating the competition of tenants for vacant premises at the end of leases, there would be very little to look to for guidance and example as to the rents which premises were commanding. The effect of the Act might be to close the market, in much the same way as the Rent Acts had closed the rental market for vacant properties.

There might be interesting developments in the particulars which were supplied of properties. It would seem that, when once goodwill was paid for, it would not have to be paid for a second time. To take as an example the case of a butcher's shop in a main street, if that butcher for one reason or another vacated the premises, he would have to be paid for the goodwill left behind of a butcher. It might then be advertised for sale as "free of payment for goodwill," just as one used to see "toll free" round Covent Garden Market. That would be a sort of vaccination so far as butcher's goodwill was concerned, but there seemed nothing to prevent a butcher taking the premises for a butcher's business and invoking the aid of Section 19 (where appropriate) and changing over the business to, say, a grocery business, and then the landlord having to pay the compensation for a grocer's business at the end of the lease.

That raised a practical point for the consideration of valuers, in that when they had to value shops and business premises after the Act was in full operation they might be wise to inquire whether any notices had been received in respect of improvements. The landlords would know, to some extent at any rate, what their liabilities might possibly be.

It might, of course, be accepted as a truism that an Act such as that in question, if it achieved its objects, must pass some of the value, which to-day was owned by the landlords, over to the tenants. To that extent, at any rate, the valuations of property might be altered, although other circumstances might counteract it.

The Act might have unexpected results, just as the Rent Acts had had unexpected results. If rival traders or anxious traders could get vacant possession of trade premises by buying the freehold and becoming the landlord, and wanting the premises for their own possession—which seemed to be possible under the Act—there might be a large increase in the capital value of properties, much as there had been such an increase under the Rent Acts. That possibility could not be ruled out.

In that connection he wished to put a problem to Mr. Crouch with regard to concurrent leases. It seemed to him a concurrent lease might easily be a means of avoiding the provisions of the Act. As an example, a shop might be let to a certain trader at a rent of £100 a year. The true value might be £150 a year, which would probably be the rent the tribunal would order at the end of the term. Someone carrying on the same trade as the occupier might approach the landlord and offer him double the rent for a reversionary lease. The reversionary lease would, of course, be no good, but it would be of interest to know whether a concurrent lease might not be a means of evading the Act. Assuming the sitting tenant had, say, a term of 4 years to run, and the competitor was asking for a term of 21 years, if, to-day, the freeholder granted to the competitor a lease for 25 years, subject to and with the benefit of the existing lease, at a rent of £100 a year for the first 4 years and thereafter the £300 or £400 the competitor was willing to pay, it would be of interest to know whether the competitor getting the benefit of that concurrent lease would or would not then be in the position of the sitting tenant's landland, and be able, under the Act, to obtain possession at the end of the current term.

One of the effects of the Act, with all the difficulties it created for landlords, would be to cause landlords to resort more and more to skilled persons for the management of their properties. He thought it was likely to go further than that, and was likely to increase the tendency for properties to be held by property-owning companies which would have a skilled staff to look after the management and have sufficient finance to be able to meet the calls made from time to time for compensation for improvements and for other matters.

There was one matter he wished to mention in conclusion. He thought the Act in its early days would bring up many peculiar problems for settlement, including many problems which would arise in connection with small properties and which it would be difficult to bring before a wider public than those immediately concerned. He hoped The Institution might find some means whereby cases of technical interest, however small, might be brought to the notice of the members of The Institution. Perhaps it might not be too much to appeal to the members of The Institution to send notes of the decisions and interesting points, however small they might be, to The Institution, so that they could be circulated.

He wished once more to thank Mr. Crouch for his most useful and instructive Paper, which was one to which the members of The Institution would often have recourse in the future.

Mr. W. S. Walker (Fellow) wished to join with other speakers in thanking Mr. Crouch for his Paper. Most of the members of The Institution were interested in the subject with which the Paper dealt, and most of them read and studied the Bill during its progress through Parliament, and many had got so muddled in consequence that a Paper like Mr. Crouch's was of real value and very useful to them.

He wished to say a few words on the question of compensation for goodwill. The clause which worried him was paragraph (d) of Section 4, which laid down that the tribuual, in determining the amount of compensation to be paid for goodwill, should "disregard any value attributable "exclusively to the situation of the premises." It was the word "exclusively" which bothered him. It was difficult to think of any portion of goodwill which was exclusively attaching to the premises; it was partly attached to the premises, but not exclusively in its grammatical sense, so far as he could see.

As an example one might take ths case of a railway bookstall. That clearly depended very largely on the situation, but a little of it depended upon the fact that the bookstall had been there a long time, and perhaps on the manager; one could not say any of that goodwill was exclusively due to the situation. If so, the landlord would have to pay for the goodwill that remained to the premises by reason of its situation, unless one could bring in paragraph (a) that "The sum to be awarded as compensation for such "goodwill shall not exceed such addition to the value of the "holding at the termination of the tenancy as may be deter- "mined to be the direct result of carrying on the trade or "business by the tenant or his predecessors." Those two clauses seemed to him rather at variance. The tenant was only to be paid for the goodwill which attached to the premises as the direct result of his carrying on his business, but undoubtedly in many trades a good lot of business came from the situation.

Mr. F. H. Rex (Fellow) said it gave him very great pleasure to be able to associate himself with the vote of thanks so ably proposed and seconded by Mr. Gerald Eve and Mr. Sydney Smith. An act such as that in question required concentration and a legal mind to appreciate it, and it had been so ably dealt with by Mr. Crouch that, as had been said, surveyors would constantly refer to the Paper to find out the meaning of some of the intentions of the Act.

There were two things in particular which were worth attention. One was the cumbersome procedure which had to be taken to arrive at a settlement. Had it been possible, as was at first suggested when the Act was a Bill, to get a short cheap reference to an authority, very much the same as was provided for by the Act, but without the intervening legal proceedings in court, it would have been very much better. It appeared to him that every case would require at least three hearings in Court before it could be settled. The case had first to be initiated in the county court or High Court. It then went to the referee, and then the Court again had to settle whether the referee's report was to be accepted or varied. It seemed to him the course provided for was an unnecessarily expensive one.

Another point which worried him was the payment of compensation for improvements, and he would confine his remarks to that and not deal with the other sections of the Act.

His experience taught him that most improvements that were made by tenants were paid for long before the end of the lease. For instance, a few years ago a tenant came to him and said he wanted to spend £2,000 on altering his premises. He looked up the register of his holding and said to him "You have only 4½ years of your lease to run, and at the end of your term a valuation will have to be made, and "if you spend £2,000 now it may mean you may have to pay "a considerable rent in consequence of that expenditure." The tenant replied "If I cannot make that £2,000, and a "considerable profit in addition, in the four years, I shall be a "foolish man to spend £2,000 on the premises." The tenant was therefore perfectly satisfied to spend that money, and he recouped himself before the end of the lease.

Now, taking that case, as he read the Act the tenant would be entitled at the end of the lease to ask for compensation to the extent of something, it might be, approaching the expenditure. In the case in point, as a matter of fact, the tenant came to him at the end of the lease and said "Grant me a building lease and I will rebuild the "whole property," and that lease was running at the present time. But in many cases where claims would be made the outlay for improvements would have been recouped by the lessee long before the lease expired, and it appeared to him the Act would have the effect of giving to the lessee over again something which he had already had. That might apply, of course, in some cases only, but it appeared to him to be rather a general practice for tenants only to spend money on improvements if they saw their way to get it back. There were many things to be taken into consideration, but he failed to find anything in the Act which would take into consideration at all any recoupment the tenant was able to get from his business as a result of spending the money unless Sub-section (3) of Section 2 was intended to have that effect.

There were other difficulties which he would like to hear dealt with. There was the case where a tenant acquired an adjoining shop and the party-wall was removed. He had in mind a case where that had been done, and where in consequence the premises let for less than would have been the case had they been separate shops; yet the tenant might be entitled to come and ask for the removal of that party-wall, with every chance of the tribunal saying, in these days at any rate, that it was an advantage to make premises larger than they were before.

There was another point to which he should like to draw Mr. Crouch's attention, as to whether anything was provided in the Act to meet the case of a tenant who had a renewal, and where it was stated in the lease that the rental value was, say, £200 a year, but that he was having the lease granted for £175 by reason of his being an old tenant of long standing on the estate, so that he was granted a rental of less than the full market value at the time of the granting of the lease. He desired to know whether such a lease would come under the benefits received by the tenant in reduction of the tenant's claim under Section 2, Sub-section (3).

The other difficulty was the one to which reference had been made by both the previous speakers, namely, the payment of compensation by owners who had short terms. There were many properties which were held three or four deep between the freeholder and the occupier. One man might have four years, another six years, and another ten years, and so it got back eventually to the freeholder. He presumed that the compensation had to be paid at the time when the tenant left, and that his immediate landlord could recover only at the time of the expiration of his tenancy some years afterwards, and the same applied to the lessee behind him, during which time the property might have gone through many vicissitudes and it would be a difficult matter in all cases to recover. Any information on that point he would be only too delighted to hear, so that one might know exactly how that worked out.

He wished to associate himself with the vote of thanks, as the members of The Institution were deeply indebted to Mr. Crouch for his Paper.

Mr. C. Bowes (Fellow) regarded it as a very great privilege to be allowed to support the vote of thanks to Mr. Crouch which had been so ably proposed, seconded and supported by previous speakers. He confessed that as an inexperienced speaker he was somewhat appalled by the magnificence of his surroundings and the eminence of the gentlemen he saw before him, so that he hoped he would be forgiven if his remarks were incomplete.

It seemed to him the Paper gave a complete summary of the Act, but it was left to surveyors to plough a somewhat lonely furrow in its practical application, and that the legal profession would come to their support or criticism only in the Courts and at great expense.

He proposed to confine his remarks to Part II. of the Paper, which had not been touched on by previous speakers —pages 126 to 130 of the Transactions, and Sections 18 to 20 of the Act—and to touch more particularly on the question of dilapidations. It seemed to him that, as set out in the Act and in Mr. Couch's Paper, the question was divided into two or three parts. There were dilapidations generally, the measure of damage and the mode of claim. In dealing with dilapidations it seemed to him one would have to consider interim schedules and final schedules separately because different conditions applied, and he proposed to do so, therefore, in his remarks.

In considering the Act and the Paper he asked himself What is the practical effect on me as a surveyor? Am I to alter my mode of procedure in future, or to carry on as I have done in the past? With regard to interim schedules, it seemed to him the procedure was not greatly altered. He would take his lease, go to the property, and see what dilapidations had occurred under his lease, subject, of course, to the provisions of Section 147 of the Law of Property Act with regard to internal decorative repairs.

It was when one came to the final schedule that it seemed to him surveyors would have to alter their mode of procedure. In the absence of any instructions to the contrary, he should assume that the premises were to continue to be used in the manner in which they had previously been used. There, again, he supposed it would be necessary for him to consider whether he was acting for the lessor or the lessee. If he were acting for the lessor, he thought he should assume that the premises were to continue to be used as before, unless he had definite instructions to the contrary or it was generally known that the premises were to be pulled down or altered in user or materially altered. If they were to be materially altered, his schedule would have to apply to the portion which was to remain. On the other hand, if he were acting for the lessee, it was important for him to be able to bring forward some evidence as to the future user; and if in the course of investigations he was able to find any indication that the premises were to be demolished or altered, he assumed he should include any evidence he could obtain in his report to his client. He regarded that as a very important point.

With regard to measure of damage, it seemed to him it was very important to note the actual words of the Act. Measure of damage was not to exceed the amount, if any, "by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate "or not) in the premises is diminished." Mr. Crouch in his opening statement expressed some doubt as to the meaning of the words "by which the value of the reversion "(whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished," and suggested it was a question whether this applied to the freeholder's reversion or the sub-lessee's. He put it forward as a suggestion only that if he was employed as a surveyor to prepare a schedule of dilapidations under a lease—it might be a head-lease or a sub-lease—he should prepare his schedule under that particular document. Mr. Crouch went on to say that the Courts interpreted the particular document before them, and did not have regard to general applications. In the same way it appeared to him that if he only assessed dilapidations under the lease which was actually before him he could not go far wrong, but he would like Mr. Crouch to correct him if he was wrong.

Mr. CROUCH, interposing, said that was quite right; he did not question that at all. Mr. Bowes was perfectly right, as far as he knew, on that first point, but that was not the point he was criticising, which was the measure of damage.

Mr. BOWES (continuing) said it was generally accepted the measure of damage was the damage to the value of reversion, but he believed it had been questioned by learned judges as to whether that was the correct interpretation or not, and surveyors were glad to see the matter had now been given statutory sanction.

The question might be asked What is the practical effect of this? What is this measure of damage? Is it the present cost of complying with the schedule, deferred on a suitable table for the period of the reversion; or is it the deferred estimated cost of complying with the schedule at the end of the term, bearing in mind that the effect of dilapidations is cumulative; or is it the present difference in market value of a property consequent on the state of repair? It seemed to him the last was the correct interpretation. To take a practical example, one might take the case of a property let on lease, the lease of which had 40 years to run. The present cost of dilapidations would be, say, £500. The effect of that on the value of the reversion with 40 years to run would be, comparatively speaking, very small. Assuming it was £50, and that the lessor succeeded in a claim for forfeiture, he suggested that was hard on the lessor to have to go in and undertake a necessary expenditure of £500, recovering only £50 from the lessee. It might be said the lessor should have served the schedule of dilapidations at an earlier date. So he should, but there were many cases in which the property was in the hands of a widow or some other person who did not understand management, and then when it reverted to trustees they had to bear the brunt of the whole matter.

In that connection he had heard it argued by members of The Institution, among others, that because the measure of damage is the damage to the reversion, in preparing a schedule it should include only the dilapidations which were likely to damage that reversion. Personally he could not feel that was at all the correct view.

The remainder of Part II. of the Act dealt with the lessee's right to assign, sub-let, make alterations and improvements, and to alter user. In view of the lateness of the hour there was only one point he wished to make on that. Whereas in future the lessor would have no right to refuse a lessee the right to sub-let or to carry out improvements, he could, in a lease, arbitrarily refuse to permit alterations in user, or, at any rate, that was how personally he read the Act. In each of the other clauses it said that the landlord's consent must not be withheld unreasonably, but in the case of an alteration of user he believed no such words were used.

He did not propose to deal with Section 20, which dealt, as the author said, with apportionment of rents and the Inclosure Acts, as he had no experience of such matters; but he wished in conclusion once again to thank Mr. Crouch for his admirable Paper on an Act which, as a previous speaker had intimated, made it very necessary for a lay person to be adequately advised on all matters dealing with leases and leasehold properties.

Mr. Geoffrey L. Vigers (Fellow) said that as a very junior member of a firm which had always specialised in compensation it afforded him the greatest possible pleasure to thank Mr. Crouch for his Paper. He had been asked to deal with one very short point only. He was glad that it was a short point, as he would not have to commit himself on definite points of compensation in dealing with it. The only question to which he was asked particularly to address himself was the question of the right of renewal. The tenant had a right to renewal only under one circumstance, and that was when he could show the tribunal that he was entitled to compensation for goodwill, and that the compensation which he would receive under the Act would not be sufficient to cover the loss to him which he would suffer by removal from one premises to another.

Mr. Crouch (interposing) pointed out that the word used in the Act was "could" and not "would"; that was the trouble.

Mr. Vigers thought the tenant would have to make two claims. He would have to say to the landlord "I make a "claim for goodwill, and/or I claim that what I am going "to get will not be sufficient compensation for me." The tenant had first of all to prove to the tribunal that he was entitled to compensation, and when he had done that he might be entitled to his additional lease. It seemed to him that a man who really had a bonâ fide claim, a man who had really got a business which was going to be affected by a removal, would find that the most valuable provision in the Act—because he did not believe for one moment that 90 per cent. of the people who thought they were going to get compensation for goodwill under the Act would ever get a single penny. He did not believe one-half of them would be able to prove there was any goodwill attaching to the premises itself. Those people who had built up a business, and who thought that they were going to get compensation, would be the people who would have to satisfy the tribunal that the removal would be a real loss to them and that they were entitled to a new lease.

If one looked at the matter in the way he proposed to illustrate, the point would be clear. There was a shop in Bond Street where he bought his hats. He did not know what the number of the shop was. He went to that shop because he knew it was there. If that man were to move his shop to some other part of the street he would not know where the shop was and would go to another shop. That man had hundreds of customers in the same position. If he claimed at the end of the lease there was goodwill attaching to the premises he would not be able to prove it, because the shop was suited for a hundred and one other trades; yet if he moved away to some other street he would lose a very considerable sum, and the right of renewal was a valuable thing to him.

Under Section 5 the goodwill was, of course, the full value of the earning capacity of his business, and he had to prove his loss. That was the goodwill he was entitled to. The goodwill referred to in Section 5 was a very much larger thing altogether.

He entirely agreed that Section 5 (3) (b) was obviously a penalty clause. It said, in effect, that if a landlord undertook to do something and did not do it, the tenant was to have compensation for all that he might lose, and that would, in his opinion, extend to any expenditure which the tenant might have wasted on new premises in fitting them up because he had to go there, as the landlord would not give him a lease, on the excuse that he was going to pull down the premises. If the landlord did not pull down the premises, then the tenant would be entitled to that compensation.

He wished to refer to one matter which was outside the province of what he was asked to deal with, namely, a matter dealt with by Mr. Smith. Mr. Crouch had merely said that Clauses 14 and 15 dealt with reversionary leases. Mr. Smith's concurrent lease was not going to be a means by which a landlord could escape paying compensation. A concurrent lease was a reversionary lease in another form. He said that because the point had actually arisen in a case within his own knowledge, where a concurrent lease had been granted as from 1st January, 1927, and in ten years' time the concurrent lessee would go into occupation of the premises. He would never be the landlord within the meaning of the Act; he did not receive the rent at the present time. He would not have to pay any compensation, and the freeholder would not have to pay compensation, because where the lease was granted before, March, 1927, compensation was not payable.

There were really only three kinds of reversionary leases, or what might be termed reversionary leases. There was the concurrent lease which ran at the same time as the present lease. The landlord took the rent, and the tenant's occupation did not start until the other tenant went out. Then there was the "common or garden" reversionary lease, which did not run until the lease had expired. A lease which was granted for a term of years for the lessee to go into possession, say, in 1932, and to take the rent in the meantime, put the lessee in the position of the landlord, and he would have to pay compensation, whereas if he had not taken existing rents he would never have become a landlord or had to pay compensation. That was one point which must arise on contracts in existence before March, 1927.

Before he sat down he wished to give an opinion on one question with regard to holdings and premises. What was referred to in the Act, in his opinion, was the holding in occupation of the actual tenant whose case was under consideration. The landlord might say he wanted to occupy that tenant's holding or premises. That meant he wanted to occupy the whole of it, and if he did not want to occupy the whole holding or premises of which the tenant was in occupation, he could not claim the protection of that particular section.

He wished cordially to thank the author for his excellent Paper, and hoped in his reply he would give some assistance in regard to some of the very difficult points which were bound to arise in the problem of the administration of the Act.

Mr. A. H. Davis (Fellow) said that with regard to Section 4 he did not remember whether it had been remarked by anybody that any lease which expired after the commencement of the Act on the 25th March next, but which had less than one year to run, was outside the scope of the Act, because by Section 4 (2) the notice had to be given not less than twelve months before the termination of the tenancy. That was a rather important point, because he had one or two cases in mind of valuable properties where the leases would fall in after the 25th March, but had considerably less than twelve months to run, so that unfortunately for the tenants they would be outside the scope of the Act, and the ordinary procedure of negotiation between landlord and tenant would be the only means of settling a new tenancy.

He wished to refer to the second part of the Act, with regard to dilapidations. At the present juncture it was an entirely new Act, and there was no case law to serve as a guide as to what was going to take place; but it did seem to him that Section 18, taken in conjunction with Section 147 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, would revolutionise, or, at any rate, if "revolutionise" were too strong a word, make a very considerable difference to the whole law of dilapidations as it now stood, and many of what were now standard cases would have to go by the board.

As an example he might quote the well-known case of Inderwick v. Leech (1884), under the decision of which the landlord was successful in claiming the full amount of dilapidations although the building was about to be demolished; this case would now no longer be law. Another interesting case was that of Calthorpe v. McOscar (Court of Appeal, 1923), which was probably one of the most important cases on dilapidations in recent years. There the lessor claimed he was entitled to the full amount of dilapidations although the property had so depreciated in value that the class of tenant which occupied the premises was entirely different from the type which occupied them at the beginning of the lease. It seemed that there, again, the lesser amount of dilapidations would be the only amount which the landlord could now claim, i.e., the fact that the property had depreciated and that there was a less responsible type of occupier would affect the amount of damages he would receive.

There was just one other point to which he wished to refer. The previous speaker gave a hypothetical case of a lease of 40 years where, if the dilapidations were taken at £50 and the original claim at £500 and the landlord went for forfeiture, he would get only £50 because the lease had 40 years to run. He did not agree with that, because if the property were in such a state of repair that the Court thought it advisable to grant a forefeiture, it seemed the value to the reversion was the value at the time when he obtained the forefeiture, and therefore he would get the full £500, and not a sum equivalent to £500 due 40 years hence.

Mr. E. G. Smith (Professional Associate) said there were one or two points which puzzled him. With regard to Section 17 (4), and in the case of premises used partly for purposes of trade or business and partly for other purposes, he would like to know what would happen in the case of an improvement such as the making of a back entrance to a shop and dwelling-house, or of a staircase from the shop to the upper part of the building, where the staircase was partly in the shop and partly in the upper part. It would be interesting to know what would happen in the case of an improvement of that nature. He did not know whether surveyors should treat that pro rata or ignore it, or what they should do.

With regard to Section 3—as to notice—it seemed to him that would weigh rather heavily on a tenant who was taking up a new lease. If he wanted to put in a new shop front he had to give notice, and would, presumably, have to wait three months after that before he could do anything. At the end of the three months the landlord might specify an objection. Possibly the case would drag through the county court and another three months would be lost. That meant the tenant would have to wait six months before he could get on with his improvement and commence business.

The only other point he wished to raise concerned the question of goodwill. He thought the definition in the Act was very vague indeed. With regard to paragraph (d) of Section 4—as to disregarding any value attributable exclusively to the situation of the premises—he thought goodwill was composed of two elements, situation and personality. In the case of a shopkeeper who, when his lease expired, took a shop on the other side of the road, he transferred his personality there. It was said the value attributable to the situation of the premises was not to be the subject of compensation, so that it would appear that such a tenant would get nothing because he still retained his personality.

With regard to licensed premises, he did not quite understand the position. He imagined the meaning of the Act was that such items as tobacco and light refreshments were the only points likely to be affected, and he did not suppose that would concern surveyors in ordinary practice to any great degree. The only other point which he wished to raise was interesting, perhaps, more from the legal point of view. With regard to title, he imagined it would be necessary in future that all plans and specifications and objections would have to be produced in the case either of freehold or leasehold property before a good title could be shown.

Mr. A. Goddard, C.B.E. (Secretary), said it was very seldom he felt justified in intervening in a discussion at a meeting of The Institution, but he wished to say one word with regard to the last speaker's remarks on the question of the definition of "goodwill." As was well known, the principle of the Landlord and Tenant Act was that where some increase in the value of the property accrued to the landlord through the energy of or the improvements effected by the tenant, the landlord should pay compensation for the pecuniary advantage he obtained thereby.

The last speaker was quite right in saying that "goodwill" was not defined. It was certainly not defined, but he ventured to think that something better was defined. There was no attempt in the Act to say what goodwill was, but there was an attempt to say what the compensation payable in respect of goodwill was, and, after all, he thought that was of greater importance. It did not matter much what the goodwill was so long as it was clearly shown how the compensation payable in respect of it was to be calculated.

The difference between the rental value of the premises for the particular business which had been carried on in the past and the rental value which the ordinary person who wished to use the premises for any other business would give was the measure of the goodwill. Suppose the premises had been let to the hatter of whom Mr. Vigers spoke for £150 a year, and a dressmaker offered £175 a year, and another hatter came and offered £200 a year. Presuming no other person except the hatter at £200, and the dressmaker at £175, would give more than those respective prices, then the goodwill in that case would be the difference between £175 a year and £200 a year. That had, of course, to be turned into capital at five or ten years' purchase, or whatever figure was taken. The turning of it into capital value was a matter for surveyors to decide, but the measure of compensation was quite clear. On the other hand, suppose no hatter would give more than a dressmaker, then there was no goodwill. It seemed to him that was a very valuable point to bear in mind. He hoped Mr. Gerald Eve and other experts in the measure would bear him out as he might be entirely wrong, but it seemed to him that if some person carrying on the same business—the other hatter in the example quoted —would not give more than any other tenant, whether a grocer or a fishmonger, or whatever it might be, then there was no goodwill.

The vote of thanks was then put, and carried with acclamation.

Mr. J. LEONARD CROUCH (in reply) said he greatly appreciated the vote of thanks which had been accorded to him. During his life he had had a great many things to do which made him nervous, but he had never been more nervous than he was that evening in coming before a meeting of surveyors and talking to them about a business which was, perhaps, more particularly theirs than his.

There were one or two points he wished to mention in the course of his oral reply. He hoped he would be able to remember what they were, for he had always had a sneaking sympathy for the man who said there were three things he could never remember: he could never remember names, he could never remember faces, and to save his life he could not think what the third one was.

In the first place he wished to say that if anyone would be so kind as to send him questions in writing he would answer them in the "Queries and Replies" in the Journal with great pleasure.

The second remark he wished to make was of a personal nature. Mr. Gerald Eve had been good enough to say that he would not venture to criticise him. Whenever they had met at rating cases in the past Mr. Eve had criticised him up hill and down dale, and said "The view the learned "counsel offers to the assessment committee is an amateur "show altogether, but I will tell you, gentlemen, exactly "what this property is worth." He was only too glad to hear that in future Mr. Eve would not criticise him, because it would be much to the advantage of his (the speaker's) clients if that were the case.

A great many questions had been asked in the course of the discussion, and he had been prepared to answer them at once, but it had been suggested to him that he should do so in the course of a written reply. He would like, however, to make one or two general remarks. The Act dealt with the most difficult profession of all—that of a valuer—and no attempt was made in the Act to teach surveyors their business. The Act allowed the tribunal to decide as a fact all questions of compensation. It had always been a marvel to him—and he was sure to Mr. Eve as well—how on earth Sessions or other bodies ever muddled out a method of valuing railways, canals and so on, all valued on the same basis. One could not appeal from a decision given by Sessions on a question of fact, and in the same way nobody would be able to appeal from a decision of the tribunal on a question of fact, namely, compensation. In the ordinary course of events Quarter Sessions never said how they had arrived at their decision; for one thing he did not suppose they could if they tried. When a jury valued a poor horse that had had an accident, they heard that the horse was of a certain size, shape and make, and came from a certain stable and had won so many races, but the jury did not say they allowed £5 for its head, £16 for the stable it came from, and so on. They took all those things into consideration, and said "We are of opinion this man has suffered loss "to the extent of £50."

Precisely the same thing would occur in the present case. No one could expect the tribunal to dissect the award. When it came to a question of assessing the attaching goodwill, it might be a very difficult thing at which to arrive; it might be a thing which could not be arrived at scientifically; it would be more or less a matter of opinion until the tribunal announced its decision, and then it would be a fact, and from that fact there would be no appeal. Most of the valuations made under the Act must be matters of opinion, and the tribunal would have to decide, exactly as Sessions did to-day, on the evidence brought before it. He would have liked to hear more in detail how the valuations were to be made, because that might be useful either in supporting one's own witnesses or in cross-examining witnesses on the other side. Counsel often found himself, moreover, cross-examined by the witness, for there was no witness more difficult to cross-examine than the professional witness.

There was only one other matter he wished to mention, namely, the rigid term provided in Section 18 (1). He did not suppose it would arise in any written question. The trouble was that technical words were used. The phrase was "the reversion (whether immediate or not)," and they were technical words. When technical words appeared in an Act of Parliament, or in a deed, the Courts always interpreted them in the technical sense. If a man drafted a will and used technical words, the Court would give a technical meaning to those words, where, if neutral words were used, the Court would try to see what the intention of the testator was and interpret the words in the light of that intention. Where technical words were used it was a different matter altogether, and personally he could not help feeling that the meaning of the phrase to which he had referred must soon be tested in the Courts, and there might be an amending Act. He very much questioned whether the intention of the draughtsmen of the Act had been carried out. That was only his opinion, however, and it might prove to be wrong. The way in which those words were interpreted made a vast difference to the whole section.

They applied to every property which came within the second Part of the Act—in other words, to all properties which were let on lease. The point was, therefore, most important.

There was only one other matter which he might mention—he believed it was raised by Mr. Rex—namely, the recoupment to the lessee of his expenditure. It was perfectly true that the lessee might put up improvements and make a profit out of them and then be repaid afterwards, but the answer was that the lessor was going to pay only for what was of benefit to him for what he could realise, and he submitted that was the right reply.

Mr. Eve had scored, perhaps, off him on the question of premises and holdings. It was not the first time, and he did not suppose it would be the last.

The following written reply has been received from Mr. Leonard Crouch:—

Mr. Eve drew attention to the definition of "holdings" in Section 17, namely, that "holdings . . . . are any prem-"ises," and so on. Whether or not the words "holdings" and "premises" are interchangeable is rendered somewhat obscure by, for example, Section 5 (3) (b), which says that if the landlord proves that the "premises are required for "certain purposes, a lease shall not be granted in substitu-"tion of compensation for goodwill." If "premises" means "holding," there does not seem to be any reason why the latter word should not have been used. The explanation may be that "premises" are part of the holding, but that "holding" includes everything.

The meaning of the words in Section 5 (5), "the value "of the unexpired residue of the term of the lease," presents the difficulty Mr. Eve mentions. It is true that the compensation for it is to be decided by the tribunal, but the meaning of the term is a matter of interpretation, and, as Mr. Eve points out, this may give rise to litigation. By the same Section 5, Sub-section (2), the rent under the new lease (in substitution for money compensation for goodwill) is to be such rent which a willing lessee, other than the tenant, and a willing lessor would give and take for the premises. A similar standard of value would, I think, be applied to the unexpired residue of the term of the lease.

With regard to licensed premises, Mr. Eve suggests that under proviso (c) Section 5 (1) the tenant would not get compensation for goodwill. It may well be so, and Mr. Eve's authority is not to be questioned; but I think it would be upon practical and not upon legal grounds. The proviso does not prevent a claim being made. It merely cuts out any value attributable to the licence—not the goodwill of the business.

The Act, as Mr. Sydney Smith points out, does not say how surveyors are to make their valuations. No doubt it is true that value is a matter of opinion. But under this Act the tribunal is left to decide it as a fact on the evidence adduced. This, I think, comprises all the law on the subject contained in the Act.

It seems to me that the proviso to Section 3 (1) anticipates the position Mr. Smith postulates where the landlord wishes to execute the improvement himself. The increased rent will be within the discretion of the tribunal. No doubt all the matters shrewdly thought of by Mr. Smith would have to be considered by the advisers of the parties as well as by the tribunal. Their difficulties are not to be gainsaid, but they are practical rather than legal.

Concurrent leases, to which Mr. Smith referred, would not, I think, be a means of riding through the Act. Such documents as leases are not read solely through the language employed. The word "demise," for instance, may be used without there being in fact any demise at all; but apart from such a consideration it would be necessary to examine the particular concurrent lease before its effect could be judged.

It may very well be, as Mr. W. S. Walker said, that difficulty may arise in deciding what, if any, goodwill is attributable exclusively to the situation of the premises (proviso (d) (ii.) Section 4 (1)). Whatever it is, it must not be considered. Clearly the situation of the premises cannot depend upon the tenant. The purpose of the Act in referring to it is obscure. It is laid down in a previous part of the section that the goodwill claimed for must have become attached to the premises "by reason of the carrying "on by" the tenant of the trade or business. That would seem to exclude all factors which do not affect the attaching goodwill, and the situation of the property would be amongst them. The problem presented to the tribunal is indeed a difficult one; but so far as the law contained in the Act is concerned, there is no difficulty—the situation is ruled out of consideration.

It is, perhaps, correct to say with Mr. Rex that the proceedings laid down by the Act are cumbersome. So are all legal proceedings—less so, probably, in this country, and now than anywhere else, and at any time. No one has yet devised simple and satisfactory ways of settling disputes, except by agreement between the parties, which is the best way of all. Between the parties arbitration under the Act of 1889 can be resorted to, but, even then, proceedings are cumbersome, and necessarily so. I am afraid there is no other answer to Mr. Rex's complaint.

A more satisfactory answer can, I think, be given to Mr. Rex's second "worry"—that of paying the tenant for improvements out of which the tenant has already made money—and that is that the landlord will not have to pay for anything which is of no value to him. The case of the party-wall, to which Mr. Rex referred, is that its removal constitutes an improvement for which the landlord might have to pay. Here, again, I think the answer is that either the landlord has agreed to it or the tribunal has sanctioned it; and that only in the event of the tenant showing that the landlord would get a higher rent in consequence can the tenant receive compensation.

There is nothing in the Act to upset the lease Mr. Rex referred to, which was granted at a rent lower than the market rent. Section 9, which regulates contracting out, only refers to contracts which deprive tenants for inadequate consideration of their rights under the Act.

Section 8 of the Act provides rights of mesne landlords in the last instance which Mr. Rex enumerates. Each such landlord is placed in the position of the original tenant with regard to a claim, and doubtless such difficulties as Mr. Rex points out may arise. If the improvement or goodwill becomes exhausted, there will be nothing to claim for; but if it has not become exhausted, there will be no greater difficulty for a landlord to make a claim and recover compensation than there was for the original tenant.

I do not think that the procedure to which Mr. Bowes referred for recovering damages for breach of a covenant to repair, or for possession, is altered by Section 18 (1). But as to the measure of damages, I would refer to the opening remarks I made at the meeting.

The Act does not refer to any covenant as to user of premises, and does not provide for a variation of it as it does in the case of a covenant against assigning, &c., without leave.

Mr. Vigers pointed out the difficulty of proving a tenant's claim to goodwill in certain imaginary circumstances. It may be freely admitted. But, in order to obtain a lease in lieu of compensation for goodwill, the tenant has to show that the compensation recoverable would not pay him. I do not think the tenant would make two claims. He would have to prove two things, namely, that he would be entitled to compensation, and that the sum which would be awarded would not pay him for the loss of the goodwill. Whether, in the event of the tribunal refusing the lease, the tenant could fall back on a claim for compensation, the Act is silent. Probably an alternative claim could be made.

Mr. Davis's point with regard to the claims under leases expiring after the commencement of the Act is justified. There may be insufficient time in which to give the notice prescribed. If so, the tenant does not come within the Act.

Mr. Davis will not forget that, with regard to case law on the measure of damages for breach of covenant to repair, the damages are limited by Section 18 to the injury to the reversion. The Act does not say that no damages at all can be recovered (except where the premises are to be demolished, and soon).

One matter raised by Mr. E. G. Smith involves a question of fact, whether the erection of a staircase or a back entrance was for the purposes of trade, or otherwise, in premises used for both. It is for the tribunal to decide it. No method of valuing such an improvement, or, indeed, any other improvement, is prescribed by the Act.

As to a tenant's intentions to effect improvements on taking up a new lease, no doubt time would be consumed in giving notices and getting the matter settled in the event of a landlord refusing consent. But it must be remembered that the tribunal has power to award costs, and a wise landlord would be reasonable. Parliament assumes that people are generally reasonable, and legislates accordingly.

Paper 512.

THE ESTIMATION OF DAMAGE IN ANCIENT LIGHTS DISPUTES.

By P. J. Waldram (Fellow).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 5*th March,* 1928.

There is probably in this country no more fertile cause of dispute between neighbours than proposed obstruction of light and air by the raising and extension of buildings in closely built towns.

The adjoining owner or occupier almost invariably believes, quite honestly, that he will suffer a severe permanent and intolerable injury to the reasonable user of his premises. The building owner, no less sincerely, generally thinks that he is being blackmailed. Either view, sometimes both, may be correct; but the circumstances of almost every case differ, the only factor which one can confidently expect to find as a common denominator is that of the views of each side being more or less exaggerated.

It is very frequently the duty of surveyors to compose such differences by negotiation, by effecting suitable modifications of the proposed building where the injury threatened would be serious or intolerable, and by estimating and agreeing monetary compensation where such is appropriate or acceptable. In cases where friendly settlement proves to be impossible, it frequently falls to surveyors to assist the courts by evidence as to the facts, qua light, and their effect upon value.

The first operation in these quasi-medical duties is to diagnose the case, and much of the trouble, unnecessary litigation and injustice associated with the term "ancient lights" has arisen from a lack of exact knowledge.

Your Council has asked the writer for a description of the modern methods of ascertaining and of presenting the facts of any case.

Twenty years ago daylight had not been measured, and no attempt had been made to define its adequacy for interiors, far less to standardise it. All expert evidence was of necessity mere guesswork, with the guesser wholly and blissfully unaware that his own eyes unaided were, generally speaking, useless as a measuring instrument.

This difficulty, however, may now be considered to have been overcome. Standards of good, adequate and inadequate light are firmly established, whilst simple methods have been evolved, widely used and as widely published, of ascertaining, of predicting and of depicting the facts of any case, however complicated.

The accuracy of these methods has survived critical investigation by the National Physical Laboratory, Teddington, and it is possible to obtain from H.M. Stationery Office a Government report (Technical Paper No. 7, Illumination Research Committee, Department of Scientific and Industrial Research) which places them beyond dispute.

Those who are sufficiently interested to go more deeply into fundamentals can obtain the necessary material in Papers read before the Illuminating Engineering Society in May, 1923, and the R.I.B.A. in 1925.*

Complete knowledge of the tools which we use is, of course, always desirable, but it is by no means essential to their employment.

A great deal of scientific knowledge goes to the manufacture and calibration of ordinary clinical thermometers, but the physician or the nurse do not necessarily need to possess it.

Inwood's Tables are produced by means of abstruse mathematical processes, but surveyors can use them without being competent to compile them.

Similarly the proof of the accuracy of the labour-saving diagrams by which problems in daylight illumination can readily be solved may involve higher mathematics, yet their accurate employment in the solution of daylight problems is well within the capacity of any ordinary school-boy.

* Illuminating Engineering (1923), Vol. XVI., p. 90 (32, Victoria Street, or Batsford's, Holborn); R.I.B.A., (1925), Vol. XXXII., p. 405 (9, Conduit Street, W. 1).

You will therefore be relieved to hear that only a brief description is necessary of the methods employed to elucidate the facts of any problems in daylight illumination by the modern or, as it is sometimes called, the scientific method.

If the term "scientific" indicates anything involving special knowledge, this is a misnomer. But in so far as scientific treatment presupposes the accurate employment of logical common-sense, it may perhaps be employed.

The basic principles of the methods employed are simple and apparently self-evident, yet neglect of them has, in the past, led to much muddled reasoning and inaccurate evidence, and is doubtless largely responsible for the well-known definition of an expert witness.

They are as follows :—

(1) That the material illumination of any interior position can never be other than a proportion, generally a surprisingly small proportion, of the light existing simultaneously out of doors, and can only be expressed as such. Natural illumination cannot be expressed as being of any fixed value, as is the case with an interior lit from artificial sources, such as 1-foot candle (the illumination obtained from 1 candle at a distance of 1 foot), or 2, 5 or 20-foot candles. Whatever it may be at one moment, it will almost certainly be something quite different an hour or so later. Sometimes in windy changeable weather it will vary by several hundreds per cent. from one minute to the next.

(2) That the light by which objects are rendered visible is not the light which falls on them, but the light which is reflected from them into the eyes of the observer. The useful light in an office is not the light which an observer notes when he walks into the room and looks out of the window; nor is it merely the light which falls on the table. It is the light which can be reflected from books, papers, drawings, &c., into the eyes.

(3) That the human eye is generally quite unconscious of huge percentage differences in daylight.

(4) That with a given sky brightness the useful light at any interior position depends primarily upon how much sky can be seen from that position through the windows, and how high that sky is above the horizon.

Light reflected from external objects and from the walls and ceilings of interiors is very seldom sufficient per se to supply light reasonably adequate for ordinary purposes.

(5) That any definition of adequacy in daylight illumination must of necessity cover the condition of moderately dull weather such as a wet day in summer, when the visible sky is fortunately practically uniform at all aspects. In so far, therefore, as adequacy can be defined as adequacy in moderately dull weather—and no other criterion would appear to be possible—we may neglect aspect and sun and pre-suppose a uniformly grey sky.

Standard Sky Brightness.

The brightness of the sky on such a moderately dull day has been standardised, at least for this country, by the National Physical Laboratory at 500-foot candles, i.e., such a sky brightness as would cause a white card open to a complete hemisphere of sky (as when laid on a flat roof higher than all surrounding buildings) to be as bright as it would be were it exposed to a measured illumination of 500-foot candles; or when exposed to half a hemisphere of sky (as when laid upon the sill of an unobstructed window) to be as bright as it would be were it exposed to a measured illumination of 250-foot candles.

Sill Ratio.

Clearly if daylight illumination at table height can correctly be expressed as a ratio of the light falling simultaneously upon any unobstructed window-sill, the difficulty caused by the violent fluctuations of daylight disappears, provided that all our ideas of adequacy of daylight be confined to some definite condition of moderately dull weather such as a wet summer day. Under such conditions a sill ratio of 1 per cent. will always represent $2\frac{1}{2}$-foot candles, and the fairly-well known legal "grumble "point" of 0·4 per cent. sill ratio will always mean 1-foot candle.

A very cursory glance at the history of the subject may not, perhaps, be inappropriate.

The theoretical possibility that interior daylight illumination could be expressed as a proportion of the light obtaining simultaneously out of doors was in point of date first suggested by Mr. Trotter, late Electrical Adviser to the Board of Trade. A search for a suitable photometer to prove the accuracy of a similar, although independent, suggestion by the writer that interior illumination was probably some function of the brightness of zenith sky, brought the writer into touch with Mr. Trotter, to whom he is indebted for much generous assistance in the early stages of the development of the general system.

At that time there was not even a portable illumination photometer by which full daylight could be measured, the only instrument available being the Trotter photometer, a square box carrying a slotted white disc, in which it was possible to effect measured adjustments of the brightness of the slot which was illuminated by a standard lamp and battery inside the box, until the brightness of the slot equalled the brightness of the surrounding disc, the illumination falling on the latter being measured by the extent of adjustment necessary.

This, however, only read up to 12-foot candles, whereas full daylight can reach 10,000-foot candles. The difficulty was overcome by fitting over the disc a tube of known length, closed at the top with accurately cut "stops," whereby only a small known proportion, $\frac{1}{1000}$, $\frac{1}{500}$, $\frac{1}{2000}$, &c., of the light from any total hemisphere of sky was admitted to the measuring disc (vide Walsh, Elementary Principles of Lighting and Photometry (1922, Methuen), p. 157). Simple and obvious as this solution is, the state of our knowledge of the subject at that time was such that its evolution took some months of hard study; and it was quite a thrilling day when the first model, built up of cardboard tubes in the drawing office, not only proved to be accurate within the usual limits of experimental error, but also established the fact that daylight ratios measured with it in a number of different indoor positions were, as had been predicted theoretically, constant over the wide ranges of light from sunrise to sunset.

After this, progress was rapid. Daylight ratios were measured in many positions and in many buildings, the results being published from time to time. The system was adopted for measuring the light in factories by Home Office inspectors, and by 1914 had become so widely accepted that it was adopted by the National Physical Laboratory and used in the long investigations comprised in the voluminous reports of the Home Office Departmental Committee on Factory Lighting in many industries (H.M. Stationery Office, Cd. 8000, Cd. 1418, Cd. 1686; Cd. 8000 is out of print).

Standards of good, adequate and inadequate light were proposed and established, and it is interesting to note that the most intensive modern scientific investigation in this and other countries, to say nothing of hundreds of ancient lights cases, has failed so far to alter the standards first arrived at by the laborious process of noting the opinions of ordinary people, and then measuring the light which they had judged as good (1 per cent. sill ratio and over), adequate (1 per cent. to 0·4 per cent. sill ratio), or inadequate (0·4 per cent. sill ratio and under). Of course we know now that 1 per cent. sill ratio really means $2\frac{1}{2}$-foot candles, and that 0·4 per cent. means 1-foot candles, but we did not know this at that time. These values may seem a little low according to text-books on artificial lighting, but in view of comprehensive tests in Government offices, I do not expect to find the original standards varied.

But ability to measure existing conditions is one thing; ability to predict the result of altered conditions is quite another. Disputes between neighbours over ancient lights demand some exact, simple and speedy method of predicting the effect of proposed obstructions. Screen tests are not always feasible, and are seldom conclusive except in cases which are obvious without them.

Many ingenious methods have been devised, but have proved to be either impracticable or inaccurate. One was forced back on the simple but tedious process of setting up from a number of interior positions geometrical projections of the windows and of what sky or obstruction could be seen through them on diagrams like those used for sun (Figs. 7 and 8), calculating the light by laborious applications of Lambert's law. This took considerable time, but it had to be done. The flat projection of a quarter sphere used serves very well for ascertaining obstructions to possible sunlight; but sunlight, valuable as it is, is separate from, and has little or nothing to do with, the adequacy or inadequacy of light; because the latter must be sufficient, not only when the sun is shining, but also in moderately dull weather, such as a wet but not thundery day in summer, when it is reasonable to expect adequate light.

Far too much importance is often given by architects and surveyors to sun or aspect, not only for its own sake, but as indicating obstruction to light or the reverse. But on a grey day all parts of the sky are alike, and all criteria of accuracy must therefore be applied to the condition of a grey uniform hemisphere of sky.

For so long as the only known method of depicting angular projections of the sky was to plot them on the ordinary flat projection of a quarter sphere marked with 10 degrees angular divisions of celestial latitude and longitude, as used for sun diagrams, direct measurement of light from plotted areas of sky was impossible. It had to be deduced by tedious and intricate adjustments. Not only does every one of these 10-degree squares from horizon to zenith represent a different amount of actual sky area, but every measured degree differs in its lighting capacity by the operation of Lambert's law, so that 10-degree squares near the horizon represent large areas of sky comparatively useless as a means of affording light vertically on to a table, whilst 10-degree squares nearer to the zenith represent less sky but of much greater value.

Very hard was the lot of the expert witness at that time who desired to predict accurately and had to make all the necessary corrections. An enormous amount of uncongenial work went to the preparation of every contoured plan like Figs. 4 to 6, showing the disposition of good, adequate, and inadequate light under given conditions of obstruction. But contoured plans rapidly became popular and even indispensable. Counsel and judges could grasp them instantly, and expressed in no uncertain terms their preference for them as compared with the old system of flexible opinions based on sill angles, which latter are of but little use and less reliability. The demand for contoured plans soon extended beyond the Chancery Division of the High Court to provincial courts like the Palatine courts of Lancashire, to the Scottish courts (which, contrary to the usual opinion do have to determine ancient light disputes, and without the assistance of the English Prescription Act), and more lately, under the new powers of injunction, to County Courts.

Fortunately, before the demand became too insistent, the writer and his son, but chiefly his son, after many trials evolved the adjusted flat projection of the quarter sphere of sky which affords the light received by an unobstructed window sill shown on Fig. 2, in which all the angular scales are so adjusted that the area of sky represented by 1 square inch anywhere on to a diagram so adjusted has precisely the same lighting value.

If, therefore, such a diagram be drawn 20 inches by 10 inches, or 200 square inches in area, every square inch of sky projected on to it represents 0·5 per cent. of daylight sill ratio.

The mathematics which prove its accuracy (Ill. Eng., Vol. XVI. (Batsford)) may appear to be a little involved, but are really quite simple. In any case its use and also its construction are simplicity itself. As will be seen on Fig. 2, all that is involved in its construction is a semicircle drawn at one end and divided into degrees. These projected horizontally give vertical angular divisions of one-half the amount, the horizontal angular divisions being a simple division of the base into 180 equal parts, on the principle that to any given interior position lateral sky has precisely the same value as sky directly in front of a window, provided it be visible through the window from that interior position.

Preparation of Contoured Plans.

Your Council has requested that the process of preparing contoured plans of rooms showing the disposition of good, adequate and inadequate light under any given conditions of obstruction may be illustrated by taking typical rooms in this Institution. On Figs. 4 to 6 are therefore shown plans of rooms which are doubtless familiar—the North and South Reading Rooms, and the rooms occupied by the Assistant-Secretary (Mr. Evans), and the Building Act Committee, all on the ground floor, and the office of the Librarian (Mr. Wheatley) next to the Library on the first floor.

These five examples comprise rooms varying considerably in size and character with a satisfactory varied collection of obstructions, a wide and a narrow street, and an internal light well. It is hoped that members will have compared the lighting conditions in these rooms with the contoured plans of them, and will be prepared to comment upon the efficiency or the reverse of such plans as depicting their impression of the lighting conditions, always remembering that the plans, being those of offices, all relate only to light at table height, and in moderately dull weather.

It is also hoped that, in the discussion which it is the principal object of this Paper to evoke, members will record their opinion as to the extent by which the rental or capital value of these rooms, as offices, is reduced by any inadequacy in lighting. Some suggestions as to the principle upon which this very important matter might be considered are given at the end of this Paper.

The simple method by which these contoured plans—in fact, all contoured plans—are prepared is as follows :—

The first necessity is what is known as a "construction drawing," Fig. 1 showing the room in question and all obstructions which constitute the sky line from material positions inside. It is convenient to fix upon some convenient datum level and to write on the plan the heights of all obstructions. These figures have been omitted from Fig. 1 for the sake of clearness. On this plan and at right angles to the glass a skeleton section or sections are drawn indicating the interior table height or "plane of reference," the window and the height and distance of salient points duly numbered on plan and sections. In the investigation before us we are dealing with one set of existing obstructions; but obviously, if we desired to consider also raisings or modifications of those obstructions, such alternative conditions could conveniently be indicated on plan and section in inks of as many colours as there are sets of conditions to be considered. Also one construction sheet, as in this case, may comprise several rooms, not necessarily on the same floor, although it usually saves time in the long run to prepare separate construction drawings for each room.

The first operation is to ascertain from what parts, if any, of the room in question no sky at all is visible at table height in order to avoid setting up unnecessary projections.

The "No sky" line on plan is extremely useful in many ways, and it would appear to be a simple and speedy matter to set out such a line. Actually it is seldom as easy as it looks, and the average draughtsman attempting the task for the first time with irregular obstructions is often soon reduced to despair. It is, however, not difficult if one learns the principles by practice on simple cases.

The next task is to select the necessary number of reference points at which to measure the light in order that a curve or "section" of illumination as on Fig. 3 may be drawn, upon which the two "levels" of good and adequate light may be located to give points on the ultimate contour, precisely as a surveyor prepares a contour map of ground levels.

The reference points being selected, the draughtsman proceeds to measure and tabulate the angles formed of the altitude and bearing of the necessary points on the edges of the glass and of any of the numbered salient points of obstruction which may be visible through it. These angles are tabulated, often a long and tedious task which can be reduced considerably by organisation. At one time the writer used trigonometry and slide rule, but graphic methods are quicker.

From the tabulated angles it is easy to project the windows and whatever can be seen through them on to tracing paper laid over an adjusted diagram as Fig. 2. The sky areas are measured and tabulated and plotted on squared paper as on Fig. 3, and an illumination curve through the points is obtained. It is now necessary to refer to two important matters relating to light received by diffuse reflection both from obstructions outside and from walls and ceilings inside.

Light received by diffuse reflection from within a room has been measured in a large number of cases by the simple expedient of blocking out from any given interior position only the light from the windows by a small vertical screen or screens, the light left remaining being, of course, the diffused light. It was found that in cases of moderate or severe obstruction this seldom exceeded 0·15 per cent. sill ratio, the probable limits being 0·1 per cent. and 0·2 per cent. It makes but little practical difference which of these two limits be assumed, and for some years the writer's practice has been to allow 0·2 per cent., viz., marking off the plotted curves on Fig. 3 at 0·8 per cent. instead of 1 per cent., and 0·2 per cent. instead of 0·4 per cent. for the limits of good and adequate light respectively.

It has also been conclusively proved that light from whitened or white-faced obstruction, although it may be all that many unfortunate rooms have to depend upon, can only afford adequate light as defined above in the most exceptional circumstances.

Also in ancient light disputes where there is no method of enforcing perpetual cleaning, the Courts can give no credit for it.

We have now in Fig. 3 the necessary points for plotting contoured plans as on Figs. 4, 5, and 6. Upon these latter your comments are desired, more particularly with regard to what percentage loss of normal rental value, if any, each room has suffered by reason of insufficiency.

In an ancient light case one has, of course, two plans of each room side by side, showing the disposition of good, adequate and inadequate light under each of the two conditions of obstruction. The writer submits the following as the correct method of valuing damages in such a case, provided, of course, that damages alone be a sufficient and appropriate remedy.

Imagine each room in question, if it be an office or a shop or a workroom, to be one of two rooms side by side identical in every respect except that of light, both being available for letting but only one being wanted by a reasonable tenant who knows both rooms well. The loss of rental value is surely the reduction in rent which would tempt such a willing and well-informed lessee to take the darker room.

Although this test can be applied to most cases, as soon as contoured plans are available, it will not, of course, be suitable for dwelling-houses, which must be compared house by house rather than room by room. Also this test would not be a fair one in cases where the damage is such that a substantial proportion of tenants would not be tempted however low the rent were put.

Sunlight.

As will be seen from Figs. 7 and 8, possible sun is treated by means of a different diagram, which will probably be fairly familiar to members of this Institution.* It should be mentioned that the setting out of these diagrams is in each case from the point (a) upon a light "section," viz., 4 feet from the window glass.

In an ancient light case credit should be given for all rays of sunshine which can pass the reveals, and the projection should be set up from a point nearer to the glass.

Reduction of Rental Value due to Inadequate Lighting.

It now becomes necessary to define various degrees of inadequacy in relation to their powers of discounting normal rental value. To initiate discussion the writer suggests the following tabulation as an approximation for modern office rooms of good proportion if the obstruction be uniform across the aspect. It would not be correct for the effect of irregular or lateral obstruction averaged across a room. Damage can be affected considerably by inadequacy on one side of a room extending up to the window wall.

Inadequate light from back wall. Percentage of total depth.		Depreciation of normal rental value as compared with adequate light to back of room.
25 °/ₒ	= Bright room...	0 to 2½ °/ₒ
33 °/ₒ	= Fairly bright room... ...	0 „ 5 °/ₒ
50 °/ₒ	= Moderately well-lit room ...	0 „ 10 °/ₒ
66 °/ₒ	= Dull room	26 °/ₒ „ 30 °/ₒ
75 °/ₒ	= Badly lit room	30 °/ₒ „ 33 °/ₒ

This raises the interesting point whether Mr. Evans' room is darker than the Building Committee Room beside it. It might, perhaps, be better if we could base all our standards, as suggested in Technical Paper No. 7, upon some standard modern section, at least for offices. It might possibly be agreed that such a section ought fairly to submit to some standard of obstruction, say the old 45-degrees rule from the sill of the lowest window, although not necessarily without compensation. Your comments on this should be valuable.

One word of warning. The popular appreciation of the value of daylight is rising rapidly, and will soon afford all necessary backing to a Ministry of Health desirous of securing at least the minimum of light, air and sunlight medically essential to those who must work and live where their means dictate. The R.I.B.A. has unhesitatingly announced its aversion to higher buildings. This Institution might perhaps recall * the fact that their confrères, the real estate agents of America, found that the new zoning laws of that country, by restricting the ambitions of powerful but grasping landowners, have raised rather than depreciated site values.

THE ESTIMATION OF DAMAGE IN ANCIENT LIGHTS DISPUTES.

Mr. E. S. Cox (President) in the Chair.

Mr. C. Herbert Bedells (Vice-President) said he had been asked to propose a vote of thanks to the author for the Paper of which he had given such an excellent summary. He did not think the time which had been available for considering the Paper and its illustrations had been sufficient to justify an expression of any definite conclusions upon it. He proposed, however, to make a few observations and incidentally to ask some questions.

Objection was often taken that the methods of ascertainment of the obstruction of light such as were advocated in the Paper were too academic, but personally he did not wish to associate himself with that attitude. He seemed to remember having heard in years gone by that there was a time when the results of tabulated experiments such as those conducted at Rothamsted and other experimental farms, as to residual values of feeding-stuffs, were not always acceptable to surveyors who practised in agricultural matters, and he thought a similar attitude had been taken up with regard to the methods and contour lines which the author had adopted in his Paper. As the author had pointed out years ago, there were no records of actual experiments and calculations readily available for surveyors, but at the present moment certain data existed, and he thought it was the duty of the members of the profession to avail themselves of these as much as possible, especially if, as the author suggested, the methods had been so simplified as to bring them "well within the capacity of any ordinary "school-boy."

First of all it was his duty and pleasure to propose a vote of thanks to the author for his excellent Paper. The author was nominated by The Institution as in their judgment suitable to give valuable assistance as a witness before the Illumination Research Committee of the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research which was set up by the Government. The author had fully justified that nomination, because not only had the work which he had done in the early stages of the enquiry been recognised and valued, but he now had the honour of a seat on the Committee which was continuing the investigations. The author had also received what he thought was a great compliment, namely, the decision of the Committee to issue what was known as "Technical Paper No. 7," as an advance part of their report dealing with the state of present knowledge as to light based upon a report which the author had prepared for that Committee's consideration.

He thought they were also indebted to him for having acceded to the suggestion that it would be more interesting and useful and likely to lead to the members of The Institution considering the matter more carefully if the Paper was associated with definite rooms in The Institution which were accessible to any members who at any time desired to consider the points dealt with in the Paper, particularly when that "dull summer day" arrived which was to be regarded as providing the standard of test for illumination. He was a little doubtful, however, whether the illustrations given in the Paper had been made quite simple enough to be as useful as they should be. The construction plan by reason of its very minute scale, for which the author was not responsible, and also because what appeared at first sight to be, although it was not, a confusion of plan and section, required some little consideration before its purport was sufficiently clear. He was prepared personally to sit at the author's feet with an open mind and reserving the right of private judgment on certain matters.

First of all he was prepared to adopt the Committee's and the author's standard of table height as a useful and easily adopted standard to which all the calculations and diagrams might be related. Secondly, he was prepared to accept the author's criticism of the misleading result of the utilisation of sill angles. On page 14 of Technical Paper No. 7 a section was given which proved conclusively the unreliability of the adoption of sill angles, and he advised anybody interested in the subject to buy that publication, and to consider carefully the diagrams and plans. For instance, on page 3 a figure was given which helped to make clear the author's method in preparing some of his diagrams. In his first glance at the plans of The Institution rooms he was surprised at the near coincidence of the sky visibility lines and the calculated curve of the "grumble "point." He noticed that Report No. 7 supported the author as to that point. For instance, on page 12 he found "those "who are frequently plotting the disposition of good,

" adequate and inadequate light in rooms under different " degrees of obstruction are well aware that in all cases of " material obstruction extending laterally over the whole " aspect of the window a very short distance on plan from " the 'no-sky' line suffices to reach the area of good light, " . . . . Within less than a foot one can generally find " all gradations of light from bad to good, say, 0·2 per cent. " sill ratio to 1·0 per cent. sill ratio."

The diagrams had suggested to his mind a little experiment, viz., with a view to get some sort of a preliminary idea of actual obstruction and perspective without plotting all the positions from which sky was visible. It was quite a simple matter to use a light movable table and a mirror, and so define roughly the limits of such visibility. Another matter which had caused him some surprise was the low value which appeared to be given by the author to diffused light. According to the Prefatory Note to Technical Paper No. 7, the Committee apparently were not quite satisfied on that point, because they said: "The present state of knowledge " is still very incomplete in many respects, and the Committee " is actively prosecuting research with the object of obtaining " definite information on some of the more doubtful points, " such as the effect of reflection from interior and exterior sur- " faces, and the effect of deterioration of these surfaces and of " window materials." It was possible that some further knowledge and facts on that point might be forthcoming. Certainly the effect of diffused light was sometimes quite surprising.

One question he desired to put to the author on that point was whether the lines on the diagrams as laid down were made after consideration of the diffused light factor or not. The writer's practice, as stated on page 6 of the Paper, had been to allow 0·2 per cent., viz., mark off the plotted curves on Fig. 3 at 0·8 per cent. instead of 1 per cent. and 0·2 per cent. instead of 0·4 per cent. for the limits of good and adequate light respectively. He noticed that the curves were based on 0·4, and from that he argued that the author had not considered the question of diffused light in those particular diagrams. Perhaps the author would state whether that was the case or not.

The next point he wished to make was that the data supplied in the Paper were specially available for factory and office use. He would very much like to know whether any data were available at present in regard to the minimum light for living rooms consistent with health and contentment. He would also like to know whether it was to be inferred from the author's curves that he considered the "grumble point" and the "nuisance point" were identical. He noticed about the middle of the first page of the Paper that the author spoke about the eye being useless as a measuring instrument. Personally he would not go quite so far as that and say that the eye was useless for measuring, because he thought the eye became educated. He had heard expert photographers state, for instance, that they acquired an uncanny facility of measuring by the eye, for the purposes of exposure, the value of existing light conditions. He also thought the eye had a value, because it must be remembered that when it was a question of a person taking or declining to take an office or other building, the effect upon his eye of the general aspect of things was a matter to take into account.

The author had also referred to his "adjusted diagram"; and in that connection he desired to know whether the members might take it that that was also accepted as authoritative. He presumed that by reason of the fact that it appeared in practically the same form in the report that it had been accepted by the Committee.

The author also had kindly appended to the Paper in Figs. 7 and 8 a representation of the path of the sun. He did not know if any of the members present had been troubled in the past by having to determine the path of the sun at different times of the year. He remembered very well, in connection with a light and air case before the late Mr. Gunning, he was asked to calculate the position of the setting of the sun for the 1st and 15th of each month. After much search and consideration he had arrived at a result shown. Comparison of Figs. 7 and 8 with diagrams given in Technical Paper No. 7 would be of assistance to members in solving similar problems.

It afforded him much pleasure to propose a hearty vote of thanks to the author for his Paper, and for his endeavour to make it as useful and comprehensive as possible from the point of view of the members.

Mr. R. B. MANN (Fellow) said he thought the only qualification that he possessed in dealing with the subject, and especially with the Paper, was a very sincere desire to second the vote of thanks which had been very ably proposed by Mr. Bedells and to say how interesting the Paper had been to him, and he was sure, to all the members, and how strikingly modest the author had been in his remarks. He had the pleasure of making the author's acquaintance many years ago, but a long time had elapsed since he was able to renew it, no doubt because the author had been dealing with matters of light and air, while personally he had been confined to the mere earthly bricks and mortar.

All the members were aware of the great amount of study which it was apparent the author had given to the subject; it had been known for years how the author had made the subject not only one of serious study but, he thought it might be said, a hobby. The author seemed rather shy of the term "scientific" as applied to the method he employed to elucidate the facts of any problems in daylight illumination, and said in his Paper: "But in so "far as scientific treatment presupposes the accurate "employment of logical common-sense, it may perhaps be "employed." The words "the accurate employment of "logical common-sense" seemed to be a very carefully prepared sentence, and they bore the impress of being very carefully piled up. Personally he had found that the "modern method" described by the author was devastatingly scientific. Common-sense was not common; logical common-sense was rarer. With regard to the employment of logical common-sense, he had never yet found an opponent in those matters who showed the slightest ability in that direction in any arguments with him. He thought the author presupposed a very great deal. It seemed to him that the modern method was a reduction of those interesting problems to an exact science on very severe lines; and whilst, doubtless, there were cases in which the application of that modern method would be of very great value, he could not agree that he looked forward to the day when a table of the labour-saving diagrams would be recognised by the Courts in the same way as they recognised, at present, Ryde's Scale. He was relieved to some extent to know, however, that their accurate employment was well within the capacity of any ordinary school-boy. He foresaw a great demand in many offices for the ordinary school-boy and a very great future before him.

He thought the author was a little severe in the statement early in his Paper that "all expert evidence was formerly "(twenty years ago) of necessity mere guesswork, with the "guesser wholly and blissfully unaware that his own eyes "unaided were, generally speaking, useless as a measuring "instrument." So far as his small and very intermittent experience of light and air difficulties had gone, he believed that very reasonably correct evidence had been arrived at by such men as the late Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke and Mr. Douglas Matthews, to name only two which sprang to his mind, and that difficult disputes in connection with light and air had been in the past settled between surveyors of experience in such matters in a way that subsequently proved entirely satisfactory to both the claimant and the defendant. The human element, he thought, must not be forgotten—by which he meant the actual conditions under which life and work (synonymous terms for most people) existed in London and large towns. The ruthless application by the Courts of any exact science to the difficult conditions surrounding building operations, of which the question of light and air was not the least difficult and important, would surely be a calamity. The claimant of to-day might very well be the defendant of to-morrow. Much that the author stated so clearly in his description of the basic principles was, of course, elementary, and he (Mr. Mann) for one did not for a moment believe was formerly so generally neglected as the author inferred.

The author's description of standard sky brightness was very clear, as, indeed, his Paper was throughout. He agreed that it was quite possible to give too much importance to sun or aspect, but there were cases where such required the greatest consideration, especially, for instance, in the bathroom in the early morning, where, if there was bright sunshine, it made all the difference to an individual's whole day. Later on in his Paper the author said that credit should be given for all rays of sunshine, so that he did think something of it, although he said that architects in the past had given too much thought and consideration to it. That was very possible. It was possible at times to visit a building which, although it might be only 40 feet away from a building which was considerably higher, one of the 80-feet buildings, and find all the windows bathed in glorious sunshine ; but it was also possible to visit the same building half an hour afterwards and find nothing but gloom and darkness. It was necessary, therefore, to be very careful in considering the amount of sunshine of which a building might be robbed.

With reference to the last paragraph in the Paper in which the author laid special emphasis in his very clear and able opening remarks, he did not think that, although the popular appreciation of the value of daylight was rising rapidly, that that popular appreciation would be gratified to any large extent. It seemed to him that people were suffering quite comfortably from a loss of daylight. For instance, taking the theatre of the Institution of Civil Engineers in which the present meeting was being held, although there was no daylight outside—it now being night-time—it would be seen how splendidly the electric light was diffused, and one could appreciate the improvement of artificial lighting generally. Another instance was the Tubes. Millions of the population went down into the bowels of the earth when travelling on the Tubes, and they got accustomed to being without daylight. In New York there were numbers of buildings which had nothing but electric light in the basement and many ground-floor rooms, and the same remark applied to the basements and sub-basements of London. People seemed to be quite happy with electric light and to get quite used to it. It was impossible to have adequate daylight in all rooms, especially offices; it could not be done. He had been in offices having rooms dependent entirely on artificial light. Personally he did not like it; but it was necessary to put up with it, and he did not believe it was possible that people would be able to enjoy all the daylight that the author said they ought to have. As a result, he supposed, they would deteriorate; but he thought, although it had nothing to do with the Paper, that the fumes from petrol were far more likely to cause such deterioration.

With regard to the Paper in its more serious aspects, he was perfectly certain that it would be most useful to all the members, and that they would learn a great deal from it. Whether they would all have the opportunity of profiting from it he did not know; personally he had come to the conclusion that if he had a really difficult case he would not hesitate as to where he would go. He had very great pleasure in seconding the vote of thanks to the author for his most interesting Paper.

Sir HERBERT CUNLIFFE, K.C., M.P. (Visitor), said that if he rose in obedience to the call of the Chairman to say a few words it was not because he had any intention of fullfilling the Chairman's prophecy of throwing light upon the law on the subject, or because he recognised in himself any qualifications for discussing the Paper, which most of the members, he hoped, had read, and of which the author had been good enough to give a resumé. But he welcomed the opportunity of saying how greatly indebted he felt to the Council of The Institution for their very kind invitation to attend the meeting and to listen to the very interesting abstract of his Paper ths author had given, and to the exceedingly interesting discussion that had taken place on it. He always listened with great interest to anything the author had to say on the subject of ancient lights; but he was bound to say that sometimes his interest was a chastened one when he saw his deserving client losing what he ought to get under the criticisms of the author and his devastating plans. Personally he did not feel that he had any competence at all to criticise a Paper of that kind, especially before such an expert audience which had had the advantage he did not possess (owing to an unfortunate mishap in connection with the Post Office) of reading the Paper before the meeting was held; and he was much too old a hand to undertake the criticism of a document that he had not seen unless he was compelled by unfortunate circumstances to do so.

On the present occasion he did not feel that he should venture upon any criticism, and he was afraid that anything that he might have to say would be very disjointed and of no value at all. The simple problem, of course, was: If the light had in fact been damaged, what was the value to the property of the light which had been lost by the action of the infringing builder? No doubt that sounded very easy, but as the problem presented itself to the members it occurred in a variety of circumstances not only in connection with questions which were being litigated in the Law Courts, but also on the many occasions on which the members had to endeavour to arrive at a fair ascertainment of the injury between parties who, strange as it might appear, did not welcome with the alacrity that they should the prospect of an action at law.

He was not going to suggest that he had in his pocket an easy answer to many of the problems that must be presented in the various ways in which the task came before surveyors. One of them that had always appeared to him as of great interest was the following: If a man had a protected light, i.e., a light which was an ancient light and which he was entitled to have protected against infringement, was it sufficient merely to pay him the damage which would result from the infringement of that light, or was it right to give him in addition damages for the loss of a light to which he had no protection because it was not an ancient light and which, if taken by itself, he could not get any damages for? Those surveyors who were fond of considering and discussing problems of that kind might think that problem over and try and arrive at the true conclusion.

There was one thing also which must always be remembered, namely, that the measure of damages in cases which were not being tried in the Law Courts was not necessarily the same as the actual value of the light commercially. For instance, he asked the members to consider the following problem: A man was in enjoyment of a light which was undoubtedly a light which he was entitled to have protected. What was called the servient owner, i.e., the owner of the building over which the light came, was willing to pay a sum in order that he might get the right to carry up his building to the height to which he wished to take it. He was not going to say anything about law because that was not the place to expound it, and there were proper methods of arriving at conclusions in that respect. He desired, however, to ask the members to consider whether ethically there was anything wrong in a man who had a light of that kind, the value of which so far as the property was concerned was x saying to the man who desired to acquire it "I want x "plus y." Was not he entitled to say "This is my "property; if you want to buy it, you must buy it at my "price"?

It might very well be said that the question of the proper ascertainment of damages was a mixed question of law and ethics. Sometimes when people took extravagant views in regard to their ethical rights, the law stepped in to provide a sure remedy; but it seemed to him it was quite impossible to lay down any hard-and-fast line as to what was the true measure of damages in a case of infringement of ancient lights. Everything depended upon the circumstances. Circumstances might exist in which it would be the grossest oppression to demand an extravagant price for the concession of the right to carry up a building on the servient land to a height which would make really little difference to the owner of the dominant tenement. Happily, he thought, the law provided an adequate remedy in the more extreme cases.

As to the means by which the damage should be ascertained, he had no doubt—and he did not think anybody who had any real acquaintance with the subject had any doubt—that the methods which the author had originated and developed with so much success were of the greatest possible value in helping to arrive at a basis upon which the ascertainment should proceed, in the sense that one arrived by the author's methods at a true and precise determination of the amount of light which was taken away. He could not help thinking, however, that it was necessary to be on one's guard against one thing, as he was sure the older and experienced surveyors present would agree. It was necessary to be on one's guard against assuming that, because the precise diminution of light to a particular room or a particular building could be ascertained, that could be adopted as the precise determining factor of the loss to the owner of the dominant tenement. He did not say in some cases it was not a good guide; he did not say that there were not some cases in which it was what might be called a safe guide; but he ventured with great respect to the longer and wider experience of some of the members to say that it was impossible to go so far as to hold that it was by any means a universal guide.

He thought, however, there was one thing of which the members could be perfectly sure, namely, that the ascertainment of the precise diminution of light stood as the foundation upon which must be built up to some extent the ascertainment of the loss to the dominant tenant. Practical experience of the problem taught one that it was not by any means infallible, but he fully appreciated, and if he might respectfully say so in such august company, entirely agreed with what had been said by the author as to the unreliability of the eye in ascertaining with precision the diminution of light, especially as so often happened in such cases where an observation was obtained at periods varying during many months in different circumstances, at different times of the day with a different amount of light and so on. But after all was said and done, he thought it was necessary to remember that very often the real value was determined by the view which the potential tenant or purchaser would take on an ordinary examination of the room or the building and the general view which he took as to its cheerfulness, light, and so on, and as to the possibility of its utility for business or domestic purposes.

He hoped nothing that he had said would in any degree lessen his admiration for the skill which had been shown by the author and those who had adopted his methods in the precise ascertainment of the light which had been taken away and what remained in ancient light cases. He cordially agreed with the general tenor of the author's observations with regard to the great importance of illumination in their daily lives and the growing recognition of all authorities as to the great importance of that subject. It might be the case that the Legislature in time would take such a strong view of the importance of light to buildings and to those who had to pass their daily lives in them that it would say that it was much too serious a matter to be left to the accident of circumstance in respect of the length of time which a light had been enjoyed or the measure of the windows to which the light had been received. The Legislature might say that it was a matter of such vital importance to the health and well-being of the people that there ought to be some independent and skilled tribunal—on which body, if it were ever organised, he felt sure members of The Institution would find an honoured position—which should have the duty of saying what was the fair thing to do in questions of infringement of light. That was a view for which he thought there was a good deal to be said. He was not advocating it; he was merely putting it forward as one of the points which he thought it was worth while for a great body like The Institution to consider. He was sure, however, they must all recognise the extreme importance to the health of the people of a sufficient quantity of light not only in the houses in which they lived, but in the places in which they worked; and if, as some people thought it should be, the question was ever taken up by the Legislature on some such lines as he had indicated, he felt sure that the methods of precise ascertainment of light which were being discussed that evening, not so much the question of the measure of damage but the methods of ascertaining what was the amount of light which went through the windows, which the tribunal would have to consider and in connection with which the author had made so great a name for himself, would be of the very greatest value.

He again thanked the members for the kind way in which they had received him and for the great patience with which they had listened to his observations, which he could not think were of any value, but which might at any rate afford some of the members an opportunity of considering certain aspects of the question.

Mr. D. Y. PITTS (Fellow) said he had very much pleasure and a certain amount of diffidence in rising to associate himself with the vote of thanks to the author for his very interesting Paper. He had only one reason for doing so, namely, that the author had very kindly afforded him the opportunity and even given him the invitation to criticise him on an occasion when he could not stop his criticism with some remarks of his own before he had got through. He had thought he had another reason as well for rising, but he found afterwards to his great relief that he had not. He thought at first that he had detected in the author's remarks some reference to himelf; but when the author said "9 o'clock in the morning," he realised that he was not talking about him (Mr. Pitts) at all, but that it must have been someone else.

There were one or two points on which he desired to confirm the statements the author had made. What came out of the mouth of one witness was not always considered sufficient, but if the statement was confirmed by a second witness it sometimes helped to convince other people. He therefore had great pleasure in confirming the author's diagrams in regard to which Mr. Mann had stated that he did not quite know whether they were confirmed and universally accepted. He thought the diagram to adjust the values of light had been accepted. It was rather a lot of trouble to follow the author in all his higher mathematics; but as far as he was able to do so, there was certainly no hole to be found, although he had not expected to be able to find any in that diagram. A certain amount of scientific knowledge was advisable, and although the author said that it was unnecessary to understand the diagram, he (Mr. Pitts) suggested that anyone who wished to take up the subject ought to make himself thoroughly at home with the reasons for the diagram, otherwise he would not understand anything about it. If for no other reason he suggested that members who took up the subject of light should familiarise themselves with the diagram and with the reasons for it, because it helped so much in the speed with which the plan could be prepared. It was possible to work much more easily and quickly if the fundamental idea behind the whole thing was understood.

It must also be remembered that speed was a very important point in light cases. He was sure the author would bear him out in the statement that it was the usual experience to receive a telephone call in the morning from a solicitor stating that they desired assistance in a light case in connection with which they had already issued a writ. The application for the interim injunction was to be heard by the Court in two days' time; the solicitor proposed to see counsel that afternoon, and he would like to have the affidavit of the surveyor just after lunch. It was essential in such cases to do such work as quickly as possible, otherwise it was impossible to give a considered opinion, and solicitors never would take "No" for an answer; they must have some sort of opinion.

Mr. Bedells had made the point that he was very surprised to find that the diffused light was no greater than 0·2 per cent. His (Mr. Pitts') experience was only a drop in the ocean to that of the author's, but he could say that he had never found it to be greater than 0·2 per cent. That was not only a calculated figure, but he had obtained it by practice as well, not by quite such a good or reliable method, but by one which could be relied upon when the amount was quite small. It was certainly not anything like 1 per cent.

That brought him to one of the most interesting parts of the Paper, about the only one that he desired to criticise. The author had not given him very much opportunity of offering criticisms. In the middle of page 187 the author had given a schedule of rental depreciations. The first point he desired to criticise there was that in all those cases the percentage started from zero, i.e., the room as compared with a perfectly well-lit room which was going to be damaged first to the extent of 25 per cent., and then another perfectly well-lit room which would be damaged to the extent of 33 per cent., 50 per cent., and so on. He was almost going to say that one never came across a room that had been perfectly lit and which became damaged to a serious extent, but that, of course, was not true. Like all rules, there were exceptions. Places were found in which there had been no obstruction in the past; but if any building had been obstructed, nearly always some amount of damage had been done to the rooms before the case started, and it was necessary to work onwards from that time. He proposed to deal with two of the examples the author had given. For instance, the 50 per cent. moderately well-lit room had already been damaged 10 per cent., which meant that the rent obtained for that room at the moment was only 90 per cent. of the true rental value of a well-lit room. Supposing the missing one-ninth was added and then the whole lot was reduced by 33 per cent. in order to get a 75 per cent. damaged room, that meant that according to the author's calculations, if he had not made a mistake, it was about 37 per cent. damaged when one altered that room which was only moderately well-lit to one which was badly lit, i.e., from 50 per cent. damage to 75 per cent. damage. He was very gratified to hear that the author put the figure so high. He only wished he had put it so high a bit earlier, because the author never used to allow figures as large as that. He thought 37 per cent. was rather a big reduction to make on the original rent of a room which had already lost half of its area as regards being well-lit and then had to lose another quarter. Thirty-three on the reduced rent of 90 was 37 per cent. of 100, which was the original figure. It seemed to him that that was rather a lavish scale of compensation.

This brought him to another point, which Sir Herbert

Cunliffe had referred to when he was dealing with the subject. It was not the light which was taken away that had to be examined. It was partly the light which was left, but it was mainly, he thought, perhaps, how much light ought to have been left. He therefore thought it always preferable, although some people might not think it was necessary, to have three plans of everything, the first showing the old conditions, the second showing the new conditions, and the third attempting to show what he thought the conditions ought to have been just at the point where no actual damage had been incurred. There were many cases that one came across in which some obstruction of the light was obviously correct, not only legally but ethically. Some obstruction could be put up with and ought to be put up with without any complaint. The very fact, however, that the servient owner overstepped the mark and did some damage did not mean it was right that he should pay for the whole of the damage, but only for so much of the damage which he could not have done without any complaint. In that way he thought it was absolutely necessary in every case to examine the three positions.

There was a different case in which the two diagrams would be a little bit out in the opposite direction, namely, where a building was already badly damaged and became worse damaged through the servient owner going up to a very great height and building a sort of sky-scraper. In a case like that the damage was calculated actually on the diagrams. The actual damage suffered by the old building was not a sufficient basis, in his opinion, for the damage suffered by the site. He did not know whether that was the opinion of the previous speakers—he thought it was to some extent ; at any rate he thought it was a conclusion which might possibly be arrived at after reading Griffiths v. Clay and cases of that character. The author on a previous occasion had expressed agreement with him in no uncertain terms on that point. Those cases showed, however, that in his opinion there should not be only two sets of plans. It was almost a coincidence when they gave the correct basis, but it seemed to him that an examination into the other facts of the case at the same time, in addition to those plans was always necessary. The author's plans had made a very big difference in light cases. They had substantially put the facts on the right basis, and they had cut away fruitful sources of argument and difference. The author had, so to speak, captured the wild animal and tamed it.

A great deal, however, was still left to be done, and he had attended the meeting hoping to hear the author express some opinion on parts of the subject that he had not touched upon. He had attended the meeting ready to criticise, and he therefore desired to say that he agreed with Mr. Mann that the two brief sentences in which the author referred to the sunlight were not nearly enough for the purpose of the members, who would have liked to hear a little more about the sun, especially in view of the last paragraph which raised the question of the peculiar value that sunlight had been found to possess and the great difficulties that would have to be faced in order to give people the benefit of it. He did not know whether the members realised the very low altitude to which the sun attained in this country. At midsummer it never reached above, roughly speaking, 65 degrees of elevation. There were many buildings which never saw the sun even though they faced due south; while in the winter time, when an elevation of only 15 degrees was reached, or barely that figure, it would readily be seen that most places in certain parts of towns at all events would not see the sun from one day's end to the other. The old angle of 45 degrees would only give sun for a comparatively few months of the year and for a small part of each day during those months. It was interesting to note in that connection that it was better to face south-east or south-west rather than to face due south. It would be seen from the diagram in the appendix to the Technical Paper No. 7 referred to by Mr. Bedells that where there was a high obstructing building, if the other building were facing due south, the sun was blotted out on a midsummer's day. If it was facing south-east, a little bit of sun was obtained coming over the buildings at the side. That was a question that ought to be borne in mind in town planning schemes. Streets were not really better off if they ran directly east and west, although some people had the idea that they were so.

The only other point he wished to mention was that the author had referred to the zoning line, and said that he hoped The Institution would follow the R.I.B.A. in announcing its aversion to larger buildings. He hoped the author felt suitably ashamed of himself for having gone up to certain Lancashire towns and taken the part of some building owners who were erecting sky-scrapers nearly 150 feet high.

Mr. FRANK HUNT, C.V.O. (Fellow), said that in view of the lateness of the hour he did not propose to deal with the Paper at any length, but to refer to only two or three points. In the first instance he desired to say that while it was quite good that as surveyors they should have the most efficient instruments with which to carry out their duties, he thought it was essential they should remember all the while that they were merely aids, and that they were not going to make the mistake of admitting the author's theory, ingenious as it was, as any real guide to the making of a valuation. It was just the same as a young man coming into the profession being led by some people to think that a knowledge of valuation was the same thing as in fact making a valuation. The two things were entirely apart. The knowledge was a useful aid, it was true, but it was only possible to make a valuation as a result of skill and experience, and the author's ideas could only safely be used in the same sort of way. The second remark he desired to make was to protest most strongly against the suggestion that surveyors with any responsibility entered into a negotiation putting forward a valuation well knowing that the right figure was something else. He purposely noted the author's wording in that respect; and he would be very sorry to see anything in the nature of a report of that evening's proceedings going out to the world without challenge which led people to think that that was the way in which the members of The Surveyors' Institution conducted their business. There was one further point he desired to make. He was blessed with a limited intelligence; he was a very poor example of the ordinary school-boy. He did, however, get a copy of pamphet No. 7 to which the author referred, and he looked to see whether he could get anything in that document which would help him to understand at any rate some of the diagrams which accompanied the author's Paper. When he saw that six out of about twelve of the authorities quoted therein were Mr. Waldram himself, he did not get a great deal more help from that document than he did from reading the Paper. There was one diagram that he hoped the author would help him to understand, namely, the large one, which he thought was Fig. No. 1. He had puzzled his head by reading the Paper through more than once to understand what that diagram was intended to show, because it looked to him as if there were several flights of pigeons hovering around The Institution building, each one of them numbered, and he could find no reference in the Paper itself to what those particular indications meant. He mentioned that as an example of his lack of education and the low position that he must occupy among the genus school-boy.

The CHAIRMAN said that in view of the lateness of the hour it was impossible for him to make any remarks on the author's very valuable Paper. He would therefore simply put the vote of thanks which had been so ably proposed, seconded, and supported, and at the same time ask Mr. Waldram to reply in writing to the discussion that had taken place.

The resolution of thanks was then put, and carried by acclamation.

Mr. WALDRAM briefly thanked the members for their kindness in passing a vote of thanks, and the meeting terminated.

From Mr. A. S. E. Ackermann (Visitor)—

Being engaged from time to time on cases of ancient lights, I was glad to be able to read Mr. Waldram's Paper and attend the meeting at which it was discussed.

In the preparation of diagrams showing the isophotal lines similar to those shown by Figs. 4, 5, and 6, I have used Mr. Waldram's method and also a different one in connection with which a polar diagram replaces the rectangular one shown in Fig. 2. This second method appears to be somewhat more simple, and consequently quicker, than the other, and it may be possible to make the method partly instrumental, which will lead to a further simplification.

It is a pity that so little space (only 2 pp. out of a total of 13½ pp.) is devoted to the principal object of the Paper, namely, that stated in its title. It is also a pity that the author did not state what, in his opinion, is the amount of light in a room which the Courts consider is "sufficient "according to the ordinary notions of mankind for the "comfortable use and enjoyment of" the premises. Such amount, in my opinion, is bound to be based largely on the percentage of the floor space of a room which is "adequately" lighted, the "good" light being included in the adequate. It would also have been interesting to compare such amount with that which would result from the application of the old guide in such matters, namely, the angle of 45 degrees from the sill of the ground-floor windows.

With a view to interpret the reduction of rental value suggested at the end of the Paper, I have plotted the means of those percentages, and find that two points are considerably off the resulting curve, namely, those for 50 per cent. and 66 per cent. of inadequate light. The reduction for the former would be more consistent if it were 10 per cent. (and not 5 per cent. as the mean of 0 and 10 per cent.), while the latter should apparently be 22 per cent. instead of 28 per cent.

Using the curve and applying the suggestions given in the Paper to the cases of the five rooms of The Institution, gives the following results :—

Room.	Total floor space in square feet.	Percentage of floor space adequately lighted.	Percentage of floor space inadequately lighted.	Percentage reduction of rental value.
A	263	40·7	59·3	16·0
B	94	60·0	40·0	5·0
C	361	39·6	60·4	17·0

I agree with Mr. Pitts who said in the discussion that he did not think a servient owner should be liable for all the inadequate light in a room, but only for so much of it as is in excess of that which the Courts would allow as not being an unreasonable amount. If we assume (as is my experience) that no legal action would lie in the case of a room which the author considers to be a "fairly bright "room" (i.e., one having 67 per cent. of floor space adequately lighted), then the measure of the damage in the case of a "moderately well-lit room" would not be 10 per cent. but $10 - 2\frac{1}{2} = 7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Similarly, in the case of a room having only 40 per cent. of adequate light, the measure of the damage would not be a reduction of rental value of 17 per cent. but $14\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Probably, however, the Courts would not require quite so much as 67 per cent. of adequate light for "comfortable "use and enjoyment."

An important matter in these cases, which I have not seen mentioned in any publication, is the ratio of the window area to floor area of the affected rooms. If the windows are very small, the percentage of adequately lighted floor space is naturally small, and consequently a comparatively small obstructing building will cause an actionable amount of damage, but if the windows are large, the obstructing building may be larger and yet not within the arms of the law.

The effect of window to floor ratio is well shown by Fig. 8, opposite page 15 of Technical Paper No. 7 of the Illumination Research Committee of the D.S.I.R. True, the rooms shown have no back wall, but a room without a back wall is as incomplete as a man without a back-bone. Adding the back wall to make each of the rooms 16 feet square, it will be found that, with an obstruction subtending an angle of 45 degrees from the head of the window in each case, the percentage of adequately lighted floor space in the three cases (left to right of middle row) is 60 per cent., 33 per cent. and 25 per cent. respectively. This is due solely to the difference in the sizes of the windows of the three rooms. The ratios of window area to floor area in the three rooms are 28·5 per cent., 17·6 per cent. and 14·8 per cent. respectively.

Hence the question arises, Is a dominant owner who has a room with an abnormally small window to floor area ratio to be allowed to stop a servient owner from building, when it can be shown that, if the window ratio was larger, the servient owner would be able to build without creating a legal nuisance.

From Mr. J. M. Hannon (Professional Associate)—

Without prejudice to the thanks due to Mr. Waldram for his interesting Paper, I should like to accede to his request for some criticism.

My remarks are confined to the value of the method under consideration in the limited connection with which the Paper is concerned, viz., the estimation of damage in ancient light disputes.

It would, perhaps, be unreasonable, especially in view of the circumstances in which the Paper was prepared, to grumble because it is not, without reference to certain other Papers, as explanatory and self-contained as might be desired.

Mr. Waldram states that twenty years ago all expert evidence was mere guesswork, whereas now we have diagrams, the accuracy of which is proved by higher mathematics, with the aid of which, and the employment of logical common-sense, guesswork is eliminated. We have a reference to clinical thermometers. If it is intended to suggest that the results as to the measure of damage are anything approaching the accuracy of a clinical thermometer, then I venture to suggest that such a claim must be accepted with reserve. Certain elements in the problem can be fixed and indicated on a diagram or put into a formula such as $x = \tan - 1\ a$, but there are some imponderables which make a difference and still leave room for guesswork. It may be true that the human eye is generally unconscious of huge percentage differences in daylight, but the prospective purchaser or tenant of a damaged building will judge by what he sees, and his decision will be the result of guesswork based on experience; if he decides that the light is inadequate, diagrams or formulæ will not alter his opinion.

I would mention in passing that the scientific method has not obviated, and is not apparently expected to obviate, recourse to legal action, so the lawyers need not feel any undue alarm.

There would appear to be a considerable amount of work involved in the preparation of plans. Mr. Waldram says the tabulation of angles is often long and tedious although the work can be considerably reduced by organisation. Mr. Pitts apparently goes one better than Mr. Waldram and says he would have three sets of plans, viz.:—

(a) One showing position before erection of obstruction;

(b) One showing position after erection of obstruction; and

(c) One showing (a) with that part of the proposed obstruction added to which the owner of the building to be affected could not offer any legal objection.

In some cases the amount of damage would not justify the expenditure on plans, and in disputed cases I am not sure whether all these plans would be easily understood by persons not conversant with plans and diagrams.

If (a), (b) and (c) are combined on one plan for a disputed case, the result might appear complicated.

On page 1 of Technical Paper No. 7 it is stated that there is considerable uncertainty with regard to the amount of light reflected by external objects visible from a given point and also as the amount of light reflected from the walls and ceiling of the room, the former being very important in the case of certain lower-storey rooms and the latter being of particular importance in deep low rooms where the sill ratio for direct light may be very small at points distant from the window. In the prefatory note to the same Paper it is stated that the present state of knowledge on the matter is still very incomplete in many respects. All this goes to show that there is still ample room for guessing and compromise. Mr. Waldram apparently is not averse from compromise, but this appears to be a long way off from the accuracy suggested by the reference to the thermometer.

With regard to Mr. Waldram's table of rental values on page 187 of the Paper, the table is conditional upon rooms of good proportion and uniform obstruction across the aspect. But even if these conditions are granted, I imagine that in any given case the fixing of the percentage of inadequate lighting would be found to involve something more than an agreement that certain formulæ had been correctly worked out and the diagram correctly plotted. Most cases, however, would probably be outside the conditions, i.e., the obstruction would be irregular, the rooms not of good proportion, and agreement in these cases would be still more difficult.

But suppose the first part of the table to be agreed, and that 75 per cent. of the total depth from back to front is inadequately lighted, does Mr. Waldram say that by the laws of the Medes and Persians the two "opposite numbers" (to use his own words) have only to turn to page 187 of the Journal for March, and say "The damage is somewhere "about 30 to 33 per cent." Apart from any other consideration, does Mr. Waldram say that the percentage of inadequate lighting being agreed, it makes no difference to the depreciation in rental value whether the room affected is used as office somewhere in the suburbs, or, say, in the vicinity of the Mansion House. I suggest that the tables on page 187 would be of no value for practical purposes. Has Mr. Waldram found cases in which the circumstances are such that lost light can be restored by the enlargement of a window or the formation of a new window. The assessment of the damage is then simple (if both parties are willing, like Barkis), but these cases do not often arise because, inter alia, it must be possible to guarantee that the new or enlarged window is not to be obstructed.

From Mr. FRANK HUNT, C.V.O. (Fellow)—

The few seconds that were available to me last night enabled me only to make two short points which I considered essential to be made then, and to ask a question.

The Paper, however, raises questions of a far wider range than it was possible to cover in the time at my disposal. As I indicated, the methods sought to be described by Mr. Waldram in his Paper can obviously only be a means to an end. It is all to the good from the professional point of view that scientific methods should be adopted for the purpose of ascertaining all the necessary facts, and it is further good that there should be some recognised standard against which comparisons might be made. It is, however, a question whether so complicated a system as has been devised under the influence of Mr. Waldram can ever be of common use to the members of the profession, particularly when one must recognise its limitations.

In this connection it is rather interesting to learn from the Paper itself what apparently has been its main purpose. This seems to be indicated on page 182 of the Journal, as having arisen in connection with disputed cases over "ancient lights," and its utility, I observe, is limited to proceedings in the Chancery Division of the High Court, to provincial courts, and in later cases to the county courts. In this connection it is important to note the class of tribunal in respect of which this procedure is thought to be of value, namely, a legal one. It is not suggested that, in cases of arbitration before an arbitrator skilled in values and in the practical side of the profession, these methods have proved of assistance. Moreover, apparently, it is not claimed that this method is of any assistance in determining value at a subsequent date such as between landlord and tenant, but rather in a legal discussion, before the event.

If I am right in this inference from the Paper, I suggest that it is a real comment upon the existing procedure whereby matters of importance of this kind involving questions of value should be tried out on questions other than those of law before a legal tribunal.

In this connection it must always be remembered that valuation is an art and not a science. Too often, in ordinary branches of valuation, has an inexperienced junior been led to believe that a knowledge of how to use a tool would of necessity make an efficient workman. As I stated last night, the use of valuation tables is not valuation, as behind the manipulation of the tables there must lie an instructed judgment for the determination of the appropriate table to be used in the particular circumstances. Similarly, in the adaptation of Mr. Waldram's methods, circumstances quite impossible of being recorded by his diagrams may operate to render quite illusory any conclusions sought to be drawn from his methods. That this is so was rather exemplified by the case he instanced of a negotiation pending between himself and his opposite number in the provinces, where, having agreed a compromise as to facts based upon his method of calculation, a process of haggling takes place in which some conclusion is arrived at, expressed in terms of money.

Nothing in the Paper itself or in the introduction to it would lead one to think that the result so reached was any different from what might have been the settlement had neither party heard of Mr. Waldram's system.

But the important point of it all is, not necessarily the aid which such a system may be between specialists, but its value in ordinary life when the purpose is to ascertain in the class of cases to which this method is sought to be applied, what is the measure, in terms of money, which the injured owner ought to recover upon the aggressor. In a sense Mr. Pitts indicated that there was something less than the actual measure of interference, but apart from this, after all, it is the purchaser or tenant in the "higgling of the "market" who is going to determine what, in fact, is the measure of the injury sustained.

Those accustomed to the analysis of the elements which influence value will realise that light is only one of a number of influences, not always operating in the same direction; and it would not, in my opinion, be a safe course for a surveyor to follow to endeavour to assume that a scale such as is suggested on page 187 of the Journal could apply in all cases, or, indeed, to any. If it did, it would not be by reason of any principle but merely a coincidence.

With the general proposition as to the value of sunlight and air to the health of the community there is no dispute, and this does not really enter into the subject of the evening's discussion. The merit of the scheme set out in the Paper is its positive side, namely, the guidance which a study of the axioms based upon investigations during the last twenty years, and which are set out on pages 177-178, gives for the design of new buildings. A greater study of the penetration of light through window openings is desirable, but here again regard must be had to the circumstances of a big city where one cannot expect to secure the amenities one could reasonably anticipate in rural surroundings.

One final word: Mr. Waldram refers to a Paper I presented to The Institution just over five years ago dealing with "Zoning in the Control of Large Cities," from which he deduces that the real estate agents in America found that the zoning laws there had the effect of raising rather than of depreciating site values. So far as that Paper was concerned, I am not sure that Mr. Waldram has correctly interpreted it. From my knowledge as to the circumstances of zoning in the big cities in America, and particularly New York, I do not think that the right inference is that the question of light has very much to do with what has been claimed as the stabilisation of values. What has been important from the value point of view is stated to be the protection of a district against the invasion of undesirable users.

While, perhaps, I have somewhat critically examined the Paper, I think Mr. Waldram is entitled to the gratitude of his professional colleagues in submitting his method to The Institution so that it may be examined in the light of the practical considerations which must govern its application to the ordinary affairs of everyday life.

From Mr. J. H. Salmon (Fellow)—

The lateness of the hour prevented me from taking par. in the discussion of Mr. Waldram's thoughtful Paper on "Ancient Lights," so I have availed myself of the opportunity to put into writing one or two points not dealt with at the meeting which seem to me to be of general interest.

In the first place Mr. Waldram is recognised as a pioneer in the matter of the measurement of the adequacy of light, and, since the High Court in 1922 accepted his method of measurement, and other courts at later dates confirmed the method, it holds the field until a simpler and shorter method can be found. It must be a lengthy task to produce a contoured plan such as that of the North Reading Room shown in Fig. 4. So far as I can see, about 40 different diagrams similar to Fig. 2, and another 40 like Fig. 3, go to the making of the contoured plan. The number 40 is based on the assumption that to determine accurate contour lines diagrams must be prepared not only for the eight reference points I. (a, b, c, d) and II. (a, b, c, d) shown on the plan of the North Reading Room (Fig. 1), but for 32 further reference points taken in sets of four for every 2 feet in the width of the room. To prepare each diagram (Fig. 2), it would seem that the draughtsman must measure and tabulate the altitude and the bearing of 50 fresh salient points. One cannot but think that his task, together with the necessary checking, will occupy him for several days, at the end of which time he will have one small contoured plan as the fruit of his labour.

The "no sky" line seems an ingenious short cut to the desired end, and it would be very helpful if Mr. Waldram would indicate whether he has attempted to persuade the Courts to accept "no sky" line plans in place of measured contoured plans.

Mr. Waldram showed us how to take the necessary dimensions for plotting contoured plans, but, presumably for the sake of brevity, did not refer to the use of the photometer for the same purpose. The photometer, of course, can only be used to measure existing conditions of light; it is useless for determining the extent of the light that would exist after an opposing new building should have been erected.

Mr. Waldram proceeded to invite criticism of an ingenious and carefully prepared scale to show the change in depreciation of value that would follow variations in the adequate line on the contoured plan. One or two difficulties were mentioned by speakers that would interfere with the application of the scale, but no one attempted to criticise the scale itself, because, I think, the profession has not yet become used to thinking in terms of adequacy of light at the back of a room rather than of angles at the sill of the window. In the old days the 45 degrees rule formed a general starting point for the assessment of damage to light, and if that rule still obtained, or some substitute could be found, it would, doubtless, be possible to link it up with Mr. Waldram's scale. The rule disappeared when Mr. Waldram satisfied the Court in the leading case of Semon v. Bradford Corporation that the lighting of the ground floor of a factory was adequate even though a building 73 feet high was erected directly opposite to it on the other side of a road 45 feet wide. To my mind the effect of the decision in the Bradford case, as in the later Fenchurch Street case (London and Northern Estates Co., Ltd.) reported in the Journal, has been to strengthen the position of the servient owner who builds, and to weaken the position of the dominant owner who possesses rights of light, so much that the permissible height of a new building, or point at which the Court would grant an injunction, has been raised very materially. Perhaps Mr. Waldram would give his views as to the window head or sill angle that would now commonly represent injunction point. Perhaps he would also express an opinion as to the angle at which compensation for damage should begin to accrue.

Every surveyor or valuer must be concerned from time to time with questions of rights of light, and it is a bad thing for any profession that up-to-date practice in a matter of general interest should be confined to one or two experts. A suitable method of rectifying the position would seem to be to extend the examination syllabus of The Institution so as to provide a sufficient test of theory in the easements paper and of the use of the photometer and the preparation of contoured plans at the time of the field and drawing examinations in surveying and levelling.

Mr. P. J. WALDRAM'S reply to the discussion:—

It is to be regretted that this discussion, from which constructive criticism was hoped, should have been confined so largely to those who regard the Paper to be merely an attempt to express human sensations by untried mathematical formulæ.

Nothing could be further from the truth. The sole object aimed at in the methods described is the production of comparable plans of any room in question, which will show by contour lines the disposition of adequate and inadequate light under the two or more conditions of obstruction under consideration.

I find it difficult to conceive any simpler method of depicting the essential facts of any dispute. Even if the methods of arriving at such a result were as intricate and scientific as some of my critics contend, they would still be far simpler than any trigonometrical land survey. The task of setting up ordinary geometrical projections from internal positions in any room of the windows and of whatever can be seen through them, whether sky or obstruction, scarcely seems a very terrible one for any trained surveyor; and it is to be hoped that further consideration of the Paper will show that the claim that this is a task well within the capacity of an ordinary intelligent school-boy is not unfounded.

In any case youths still at school have performed it for me, and without difficulty.

The unfortunate character of untried novelty which different speakers have attributed to the principles and methods described might perhaps have been avoided had

Mr. Bedells mentioned that it was as far back as 1913 that The Institution paid me the honour of nomination as a specialist to the Home Office Departmental Committee, and that for some two or three years prior to that Parliamentary Reports had included whole pages of statistics based on the methods described in this Paper as the most convenient method of indicating the conditions of adequate and inadequate lighting in factories.

I did not know that I have been appointed on the Home Office Committee; but this has ceased to function since 1914, after issuing its well-known Interim Reports.

In view of this record of the mature age of the methods described, members will not be surprised to hear that not only have contoured plans earned the good opinion of counsel, judges, and, be it noted, of lay arbitrators also, but that within the last few years they have been applied by architects and surveyors to the friendly solution of some hundreds of ancient light disputes in all parts of the country.

It may also be noted that the International Commission on Illumination, a body which enjoys, I understand, the official support and representation of most civilised countries, allocates special subjects to different national committees which are considered to be specially fitted to deal with them. This year it has desired the British National Committee to endeavour to standardise not only maritime signalling colours but all the adequate penetration of daylight and sunlight into buildings; a matter in which the progress of other countries, notably Czecho-Slovakia, is significant.

This would scarcely be possible if the extent of our knowledge of daylight problems had remained at the stage at which some of my critics would desire us to stay; where in light disputes one surveyor drew a section in one direction and argued from it, whilst another opposing surveyor selected as a basis for argument a section in another direction more favourable to his client's case.

That this is no exaggerated description is proved by the fact that only this week an architect actually asked a judge to consider a section drawn through an opposing chimney-stack, occupying less than one-tenth of the total lateral aspect of the window, as a measure of the damage caused by the building above which the stack projected.

I am not acquainted with the mirror and light table referred to by Mr. Bedells, and should welcome further information.

The proviso in Report No. 7 as to the desirability of additional authoritative measurements by the N.P.L. of diffused light was inserted because the available data was so largely confined to the measurements and research work of my son and myself. It does not, however, suggest that diffused light will eventually prove to be much more than the unexpectedly low values given in the Report. It may even prove to be less. The contour lines given in the Paper included the stated allowance for diffused light.

The legal standard of minimum adequate light for ordinary purposes, i.e., 1-foot candle on a wet summer day, applies to offices and dwellings. Whether more light than this should legally be protected for factories is, I believe, still a moot point. Nominally there is no legal title in special light. The adjusted diagram is merely a labour-saving appliance. Its accuracy was tested and confirmed at Teddington. Reference to the Paper, p. 187, will show that full directions for preparing sun-path diagrams were published in the Journal of The Institution in 1923, Vol. II., p. 432. They are really quite simple.

I would suggest that there is no need for Mr. Mann to dread the period when the Courts will recognise, understand, and even welcome contoured plans. This took place long since. The judges will never, I am sure, "ruthlessly apply "exact science" to their task of judging the human element. Like surveyors, they consider science to be the servant and not the master of logical common-sense. Personally I should scarcely have considered with Mr. Mann that logical common-sense is lacking in surveyors; and as a surveyor he, of course, does not expect his suggestion to be taken seriously.

I must disagree entirely with Mr. Mann's suggestion that claimants should accept the cost of extra artificial light in compensation for loss of daylight.

To Sir Herbert Cunliffe's remarks I listened with pleasure and profit. In my case the pleasure was enhanced by the fact that, on this occasion at least, he did not ask me any questions.

He would, I am sure, be the first to agree that contoured plans are only devastating in that they show the facts of any case with uncompromising and therefore devastating frankness, and in a manner which can readily be checked. The client whose case proves unfortunately to be at variance with the facts may be, as Sir Herbert says, deserving, but only, I think, of our pity.

Both Mr. Hannon and Mr. Ackerman complain of the small proportion (2 pages out of 13½) of the Paper which is devoted to its titular object as compared with the large amount of preliminary spadework. But is not this typical of surveyor's work? To devote 11½ hours to working out the facts correctly, and two hours to estimating the result of those facts, is not, I think, a bad proportion for a valuation.

Mr. Hannon complains of want of accuracy in the methods. Accuracy is a relative term. I can assure Mr. Hannon that the limits of greater accuracy referred to by the Advisory Committee would be covered by a slightly thicker line upon a ¼-scale contour plan. The present accuracy is higher than could be expected in photometer tests. The recent B.E.S.A. specification for portable photometers calls for an accuracy of only ± 15°/₀.

The eye is, of course, the ultimate criterion; but it cannot measure by a single observation its average sensation over a year. The wise prospective tenant, like the wise surveyor, tries to arrive at a true average.

It should be noted that all modern criteria of adequacy were originally fixed by collating measurements of conditions upon which a consensus of opinion was found to exist. That is probably why these standards have remained unchanged and unquestioned for so many years.

Mr. Hunt's anxiety lest my opening remarks should be quoted to the detriment of surveyors is, I trust, unfounded.

I certainly suggested that a clear presentation of the facts in the form of contoured plans tended to lessen the distance between opposing estimates of appropriate compensation. In this I am supported by the fact that only recently in a difficult case the figures suggested by a Past-President and three Fellows of this Institute varied between nothing and £5,000, and were eventually settled on contoured plans at £800; and my client—who had to pay—expressed himself satisfied. It must always be remembered that any valuation can go wildly astray when facts as well as values are in doubt. Also that a surveyor's responsibility is very different when he is compiling a valuation from what it is when he is fighting to secure the best terms obtainable for a client against another surveyor who is quite competent to look after all the interests of that client's opponent. But in order that there may be no possible mistake, may I say that even under the latter circumstances an honourable surveyor would not take advantage of any suggestion which was not justified by the facts of the case. In this I am stating merely a fact culled from actual experience.

Mr. Hunt's criticisms of the practical utility of contoured plans must be judged by the fact that there is a large and increasing demand for them; from counsel and solicitors, as well as judges, and from architects and surveyors, no less than their clients. They show what has to be implied from isolated sections.

Any question as to whether I have or have not misread Mr. Hunt's Paper on "American Zoning Laws" would best be settled by referring to the published text of that Paper.

Mr. Ackermann mentions some better method than the old one described in Report No. 7, but unfortunately he gives no indication of what it is. He desires to express everything by a single formula as to glass area and floor area. This has been tried before, but there are too many variables, window height and spacing obstruction, and last, but not least, human idiosyncracies.

A standard formula of glass area to floor area might be satisfied by sufficient glass area extended up to say 3 or 4 feet only above the floor, as is sometimes found on landings and mezzanines; but that does not satisfy a reasonable occupant desiring to work at ordinary table height.

The realm of opinion, especially of judicial opinion, is a most fascinating one into which I should be delighted to enter. But in this matter we have far too much work to do in connection with hard facts.

The communication of Mr. Salmon deals with points of considerable importance.

The preparation of contoured plans is by no means so tedious as it appears when once the draughtsman has learned to omit unnecessary work.

It is very seldom indeed that projections are necessary from points as close together as 2 feet, and only points in front of the "no-sky" line are of use. Although also on Fig. 2 a fairly complete picture of the opposing buildings has been projected, it is obvious that only those parts of the obstruction which form the boundaries of the visible sky need to be projected. These and similar practical considerations reduce enormously the amount of work apparently required.

Comparative "no-sky" plans are often as useful as contoured plans when the obstruction is regular. But they can be extremely deceptive with irregular obstructions. If drawn as a first operation they often save considerable unnecessary work.

Contouring by photometer is simple in principle, but is often extremely difficult unless the weather conditions are perfect.

The Semon Judgments are often misquoted as proof that severe angles of obstruction are innocuous. The vital point in that case was that damage was claimed to a warehouse floor lit by 17 windows. Two only of these faced the obstruction. The plaintiff relied on isolated sections through the obstruction, but the Court, as might be expected, found that there was enough light left.

Neither this case, nor, I think, any other, has given the old 45° rule any greater or any less significance or value than it ever had, viz., that a long obstruction subtaining 45° to the cill of the ground floor window subtended less than 45° to the head where the sky is cut off, and far less than 45° to the heads of all windows above, and therefore left a fair amount of light. This is in my opinion by no means a bad criterion of reasonable obstruction above which compulsory modification might start but below which damages might still be recoverable.

The criticisms of Mr. Pitts I have left to the last. If previous experience counts for anything they will need undistracted attention.

My first acquaintance with Mr. Pitts was some years ago, when I explained in a hurried ten minutes, with a train almost due, the principle of some contoured plans, which his partner Mr. Kirby had been discussing with me, and I left him a couple of early Papers on the subject.

The next occasion was in Court some months later, when I next saw him in the witness box pointing out, quite rightly, a small error in one of my contoured plans.

Since then we have met frequently, I trust to the mutual advantage of our clients.

I find some difficulty in following Mr. Pitts' criticism of the suggested table of depreciations based upon the percentage distance of the limit of inadequate light from the back of the room. It should be noted that the term "well-"lit" did not mean a room with an unobstructed window; it meant a room which enjoyed a view of sufficient sky from table height at the back of the room, under the window head and over the top of the obstruction.

The suggested depreciations could be illustrated thus: Presume a series of six similar office rooms all 20 feet deep in a district where offices with adequate light to the back commanded a normal rental of, say, 10*s.* per square foot per annum. Imagine, also, that in these six rooms the light varied, and that inadequate light existed for the following distances from the back wall, viz.: (a) 0, (b) 5 feet, (c) 6 feet 8 inches, (d) 10 feet, (e) 13 feet 4 inches, and (f) 15 feet. Then the table suggested that the comparative rental values would be about (a) well-lit room, 10*s.*; (b) bright room, 10*s.* to 9*s.* 9*d.*; (c) fairly bright room, 10*s.* to 9*s.* 6*d.*; (d) moderately well-lit room, 10*s.* to 9*s.*; (e) dull room, 7*s.* 6*d.* to 6*s.* 5*d.*; (f) badly-lit room, 6*s.* 5*d.* to 6*s.* 8*d.*

These depreciations might be considered high or low. They were merely put forward as suggestions for constructive criticism.

My defence to Mr. Pitts' complaint that I had defended high buildings in Liverpool was that a surveyor's duty was to define the law as he found it. Clients were entitled to an honest presentation of their case, irrespective of whether or not the advocate sympathised privately with the object of his client's ambitions. Hence the pleasure one could take of coming to The Institution and abusing such laws, as, for example, the permissible dimensions of internal light wells under the London Building Act.

Last, but certainly not least, I would venture to ask that when considering the more controversial portions of this Paper its concluding paragraph may not be forgotten. I may perhaps be permitted to amplify this slightly.

Public opinion is awaking in this country. It has been informed, on the highest medical authority, and is assiduously being reminded, in an ever-increasing degree, of the marvellous hygienic and medicinal properties of light, air, and sunshine, both preventative and curative. The public who pays the rents and rates, which fix the values we surveyors have to compute, is considering more and more closely the penetration of light and air into offices, workshops, and dwellings, as a factor which affects their rental value.

But considerations far higher than those which can be valued from day to day by money are the broad facts of sociological science. Sociologists tell us that workers' dwellings overshadowed and darkened by industrial development degenerate into slums, whereas those which are left with a sufficiency of light and air, and perhaps a little sunlight, maintain their clean respectability.

Naturally gloom means not only a discouraged housewife but undetected dirt. Dirt leads to squalor, degeneration, and disease. What folly it is so to arrange our industrial development that part of the profits have to be devoted to maintaining expensive police and magisterial services and the building of prisons.

It is common knowledge that clerical and other workers who live and work under artificial light, canned air, and sunlight for supper in the form of foods rich in Vitamin D are particularly prone to anæmia, eye strain, consumption, cancer, and similar scourges of civilisation. What stupendous folly it is to take pride in the the fact that out of some of the surplus profits of urban development substantial sums are occasionally contributed for the building of expensive hospitals and clinics where some of the poor victims may obtain temporary relief.

Doubtless this country has in the past kept its buildings down and apart as much as any; but we have still much to regret, and when one looks at the law and practice in, say, Czecho-Slovakia, it is indeed difficult to avoid the conclusion that this country is in danger of being left behind in the march of human progress. Architects and surveyors can do much when advising their clients. The R.I.B.A. has set its face sternly against any increase in the permissible height of buildings in our overcrowded towns. I would venture to suggest for your consideration that our Institution might with advantage follow that most excellent example.

Paper No. 513.

THE AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION: ITS CAUSES AND POSSIBLE CURES.

By W. C. D. Dampier-Whetham, F.R.S.,
Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 2nd April, 1928.

When you did me the honour of asking me to address The Surveyors' Institution on the "Agricultural Depression," I had already promised to read a Paper at the Farmers' Club on 5th March on a somewhat similar subject. However, the authorities of both bodies expressed the opinion that a certain amount of inevitable repetition would be allowable. I desire to thank them for their complaisance, and especially the Farmers' Club for permission to use the diagrams, which were prepared for the earlier Paper.

The present agricultural depression bears some points of resemblance to and shows certain differences from the two others which have occurred in the last hundred years. In trying to analyse causes it will be well to begin by considering the features common to these three periods of adversity.

The first point to observe is that they all are periods of falling prices in agriculture and in industry. It is not only that single products fall in price from special causes, wheat brought in from new corn-lands, or pigs bred too fast for the market. There is a broad tidal movement in prices, which, in spite of individual waves, irresistibly ebb away, draining the strength of agriculture and industry. In such a fall, not only do profits decrease or vanish, but the real burden of fixed charges grows continually greater.

The alternative ebb and flow during the last century may be seen in the following figures for the average prices of all wholesale commodities at the turning points of the curve of prices, the values for 1900 being taken as 100:—

	Index Number.	Percentage change in each period.
1821–25 ...	154	– 25
1871–75 ...	138	+ 20
1894–98 ...	82	– 40
1913 ...	113	+ 38
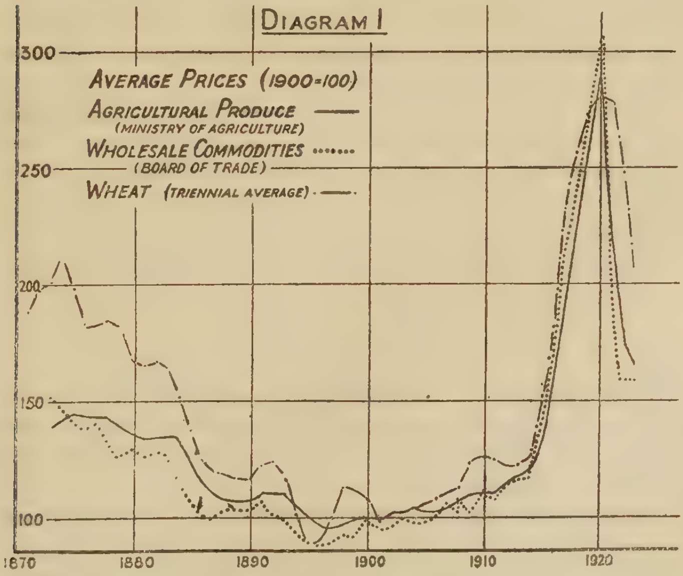
1927 ...	140	– 54

Each period of rising prices saw farming prosperous; each period of falling prices was a time of agricultural depression.



In Diagram 1 the smooth line traces the index number giving the average prices of agricultural produce from 1873 onwards, with the different products weighted according to their relative importance in British agriculture. The dotted line shows the Board of Trade index for the average prices of all wholesale commodities. It will be seen that, while the prices of individual products, for example, wheat, diverge from the average for special causes, the average for agricultural produce and for all wholesale commodities conform closely with each other. Such a concordance indicates that the cause or causes of the variations in price are not confined to agriculture. We must search for factors which concern all industry, and not agriculture alone.

The general theory of prices is easily given in a simple form. Price is the amount of currency or credit an article will fetch, and currency and credit, like other things, are subject to the laws of supply and demand. If they are plentiful, and circulate fast, money becomes less valuable relatively to other things; more of it must be given to buy them, and prices rise. On the other hand, if business grows faster than currency or credit can be supplied, money becomes scarce and dear relatively to goods and services, and prices fall. Let us analyse this relation a little more closely.

If the number of business transactions in a year be m, and the average money passing at each transaction, which is proportional to the average level of prices, be p, the transfer of money needed to finance the business is mp. If the total of currency and credit in operation be c, and it be turned over v times in the year, the money used is cv, and we get the simple equations—

$$mp = cv, \text{ or } p = \frac{cv}{m}$$

Thus the general price-level p is proportional to the amount of currency and credit used multiplied by its velocity of circulation, and inversely proportional to the amount of business done.

Some people find it hard to realise that money which we use as a standard of value can change in value. A gold sovereign, it is true, always contains the same weight of gold, but it will buy different quantities of wheat or clothes or labour at different times. These things have to be created by an approximately constant amount of human effort; whereas the quantity of money used depends on the nature and plentifulness of the money which happens to be current. Thus the real cost, measured in effort, of wheat or clothes or labour remains roughly unchanged, while the money tokens which are used to exchange them may and do vary in value. The difficulty arises from the fact that, while a change in the value of money is going on, it produces its effect by altering prices, and, to the onlooker, accustomed to think of a pound as a constant unit, it is the value of other things which seems to change.

Let us return to our equations. The effect of an increase in v, the velocity of circulation, was strikingly illustrated at the time of the inflation which went on in Russia and in Germany after the war. In more normal times, when business habits do not change much, v is nearly constant, and the price-level depends only on the relation between c, the amount of currency and credit employed, and m, the volume of business to be done.

From 1822 to 1914 British currency was based on a gold standard, and business habits, though developing according to the needs of the time, suffered no sudden and violent change. According to good custom, for the security of the banks, currency and credit were allowed to expand only in rough proportion to the gold held in reserve. Therefore, on the theory of prices given above, we should be able to explain the broad changes in the general level of prices during the nineteenth century by variations in the world's supply of and demand for gold.

During the first of the periods, from 1823 to 1848, business was expanding, but gold was running short, many South American mines being closed down. Accordingly prices fell. In 1846 the Corn Laws were repealed amid prophecies of disaster. But free trade in corn was more than counterbalanced by a new factor—the discovery of gold mines in Australia and California. Gradually the new supplies increased the world's stock of monetary gold, credit expanded, prices continually rose, and British farming entered on its period of greatest prosperity and renown. All this time transport was getting cheaper, and new wheat lands were being opened up. Yet, so long as gold was coming in fast, prices rose and farmers flourished. Even wheat rose in price by 6 per cent., and other agricultural produce by much more. Why did the tide turn in 1873? There was no sudden increase in foreign competition, yet from 1873 onwards the great depression began.

Again the chief cause appears to be monetary. The supply of gold from the Australian and Californian mines began to shrink, while the demand increased rapidly. In 1871, after the Franco-Prussian War, Germany adopted a gold standard, and she was followed by the United States in 1873 and the Latin Union in 1874. Thus, besides the needs of growing business, a demand arose for gold reserves for war chests and central banks, while supplies were getting less abundant. These changes exactly coincided with the turn from prosperity to adversity in agriculture. Moreover, the depression was not confined to England. The farmers of heavily protected countries and of new lands whose wheat we were importing were in like case. The only marked exceptions to the general depression were India and Argentina, whose currencies were not based on gold.

In his evidence before the Royal Commission in 1894 Sir Robert Giffen prophesied the speedy end of the depression owing to the discovery in 1886 of gold in South Africa, and the increasing output therefrom. He proved to be right. Prices touched their lowest point in 1896-97. From 1900 to 1914 they rose steadily and agriculture enjoyed a modest prosperity.

Thus we see that the varying relations between the supply of and demand for gold explain the broad changes in the general price-level from 1823 to 1914. Of course a complete analysis would be far more complex. Secondary causes, due themselves to the monetary changes, and other quite independent factors like new corn lands and technical improvements in production and transport, would have to be examined. These factors have determined the prices of single products and varied the rates of the general rise or fall, but during the time in question they seem to have been definitely less important than the changes in the world's stock of monetary gold.

On the outbreak of the war in 1914 gold payments were suspended. Government borrowing and Government spending swelled the total bank deposits; credit was expanded with no reference to gold reserves, while Treasury notes were issued to meet the continually increasing demand for currency. The inflation of currency and credit rapidly raised prices, and rising prices called for more currency and credit to finance the hectic business of war-time and of the boom that followed. Thus the process became cumulative and might have got out of hand. But in 1920 a very necessary halt was called in England and other countries. Bank rates were raised, credit was restricted, and prices came tumbling down. The fall, like the rise, was cumulative; contracting credit lowered prices, and falling prices contracted credit still further. Between 1920 and 1922 prices fell with unprecedented rapidity to one-half their highest figures, an index number of about 300 shrinking in two years to one of about 150. The effect on agriculture was pointed out by Mr. R. R. Enfield in his book on The Agricultural Crisis, and emphasised in the Report of the Committee of the Ministry of Agriculture on the Stabilisation of Agricultural Prices.

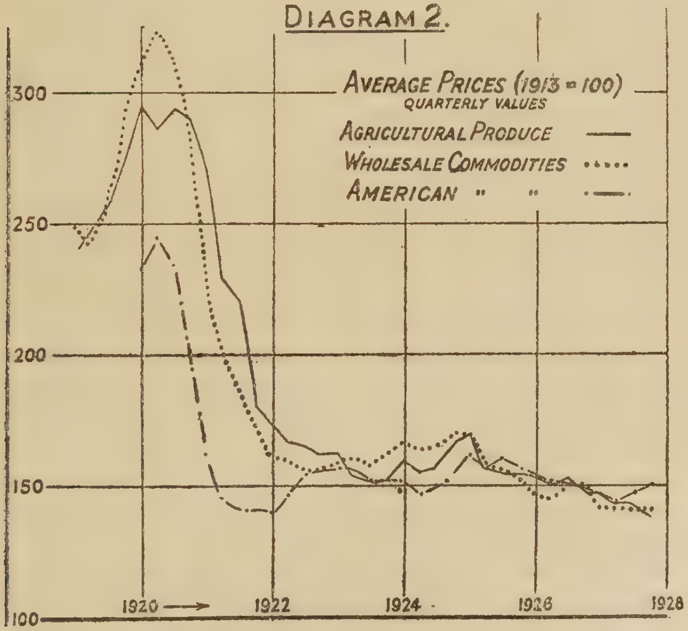

Diagram 2 enables us to follow the course of the present depression graphically, lines being drawn for the index of agricultural prices, and for the prices of wholesale commodities both here and in the United States, values in 1913 being taken as 100. After the first tremendous fall there was a slight recovery, lasting from the end of 1922 to the end of 1924. From then onwards there has been a renewed but much slower fall.

The cause of the first sudden fall we have traced above. Prices had been raised to artificial and unhealthy values by the inflation of the war and of 1919. As soon as the upward movement ceased, a heavy fall was inevitable. Monetary, economic and psychological effects acted and reacted on each other and on business. Two monetary factors must be recognised. The American curve shows that prices measured in gold were falling fast; but English pounds were also increasing in value measured in gold, as was shown by the course of the exchange on New York. Hence English prices, affected by both these changes, had further to fall than American. From 1925, when we returned to a gold standard, English and American prices have kept closely together.

It will be seen that the three great agricultural depressions of the last hundred years have been brought about by the same immediate cause—a falling average level of prices. In each case the fall was primarily due to a deficiency in currency and credit, a deficiency intensified in turn by the fall in prices. During the first two depressions currency and credit depended on the supply of gold; but from 1920 to 1925 they were restricted by deliberate deflation in an attempt to return to the gold standard at the old parity of exchange. And now that the attempt has succeeded, and our money is once more based on gold, a new factor has come into play.

At the beginning of 1922 American prices began to rise. It looked as though they would carry world prices upward with them and end our depression. But, in the middle of that year, the bankers of the United States determined to make an attempt to stabilise the price level. New York was the best market for gold, and gold was pouring in, some of it from the mines of South Africa. Instead of allowing it to become the basis for a rapid expansion of currency and credit, it was buried again in the vaults of American banks. The effect is seen in the diagram. The rise in prices was stopped, and, with small fluctuations, the American curve was kept about level for three years. Since the middle of 1925 it has been falling again, and our prices with it.

Probably the chief cause of the present slow fall is the return of several countries to the gold standard, and the consequent increase in the demand for gold to use as reserves. Of course there are other possible factors. It may be that the time of great prosperity which the United States have enjoyed is coming to a natural end. It may be that the Federal Reserve Board were afraid of a boom, and have overdone the damping down. It may be that an accidental conjunction of non-monetary causes has helped to produce the fall. Whatever the cause, it has been a misfortune for farmers both in America and in England.

Of course a slow fall in prices is not as disastrous as a rapid one; the long economic lag between a farmer's expenditure and his receipts does not produce such direct and overwhelming catastrophe when the fall is slow. But the burden of charges fixed in terms of money, mortgage interest, rent, and, to a large extent, wages, is continnally growing heavier measured in real wealth—that is, in goods and services. Moreover, in a time of falling prices a farmer is less able to meet other misfortunes; less able to face an additional fall in the price of some one commodity; less able to bargain effectively with middlemen; less able to bear the losses brought about by a spring drought or a wet harvest. Both financially and psychologically a falling price level produces agricultural depression.

Some of the ill effects not only act while the fall is going on but last afterwards. For instance, sheltered industries, working for the home market and not exposed to foreign competition, having put up their prices and costs of production when prices were high, are able, partly at all events, to maintain their profits and wages when other prices have fallen. As agriculture and other unsheltered industries exposed to world competition use the products and services of those which are sheltered, their costs of production are held up, not only while the values of agricultural produce are falling, but even after the fall has ceased. In old days prices in the sheltered industries would have followed others till things had righted themselves on the lower level, but, with powerful trade unions entrenched in the sheltered industries, and with "rings" and "trusts" among the managers of some of them, the discrepancy may be maintained indefinitely. Thus the great wave in prices due to the war may leave permanent ill effects behind even when the wave has subsided.

Somewhat carelessly and very rashly I accepted a title for this Paper which carries the implication that, besides analysing the causes of agricultural depression, I am prepared to suggest remedies. To do so is difficult. Let us first consider monetary possibilities.

I think there is little doubt that, if the Federal Reserve Board would allow currency and credit to expand till the legal ratio to gold reserves was reached, there would be a considerable rise in the prices of world commodities, and our agricultural and trade depression would pass. But the recent raising of the rediscount rate from 3½ to 4 per cent. indicates that the Board do not intend this to happen. On the other hand, in view of the distress among American farmers, it is likely that the Board will do what they can to prevent any heavy fall in the immediate future.

For the time being we are in the hands of the bankers of the United States, and while that condition holds, no great monetary change is probable. But what is to happen when the natural growth of business in America has absorbed their surplus gold? The South African mines are not inexhaustible, and as they become less productive an acute shortage of gold seems likely, with the accompaniment of a further fall in prices, and more depression and unemployment. Twice in the nineteenth century agriculture was saved by the discovery of new gold-fields. Geologists say that now the world has been fairly well explored, further large discoveries of gold are unlikely.

Can anything be done to counteract the monetary, financial and economic effects of this probable shortage of gold? Mr. Maynard Keynes wishes to depart from a gold standard, and so to manage the volume of currency and credit that the index number of general wholesale prices is kept as constant as possible. I think some such standard is the most scientific basis for money. What should we think of a standard of weight or of length which stretched or shrank in the arbitrary and uncontrollable way which distinguishes our standard of value? Probably we shall come to Mr. Keynes' managed currency in the end. But I doubt if we are ready for it yet. The belief in a gold standard and an unrestricted market for gold is an article of faith in the City of London. It keeps the rate of exchange with other gold-using countries constant within narrow limits, and thus facilitates foreign trade and international finance. In old days it gave to London the financial supremacy of the world. It brings money to London and through London to the rest of the country.

As long as the great majority of our financial leaders hold firmly to the gold standard, it is probably wise not to attempt fundamental changes; probably better, while maintaining the gold standard with its undoubted benefits, to try to guard against its dangers and minimise its harmful effects. The Genoa Conference in 1922 recommended joint action by the governments of the world to control gold, and thus, as far as possible, to stabilise prices. That this can be done if gold is in excess is shown by the effect of the policy of the Federal Reserve Board. If there were a shortage, international action must take the form of an agreement to economise gold. Perhaps in a future Utopian age the League of Nations may hold the gold reserves of the world (or at all events of Europe) and manage them so as to keep the general level of world prices constant. Till that age comes, the present Central Banks in the different countries might hold part of their reserves in each other's currencies or securities, and a scramble for gold reserves be prevented. Doubtless this action would involve difficulties, but, unless something of the kind is undertaken, distress and unemployment will become so severe that governments will be forced to move. The danger is that they will delay once more till the harm is done.

In default of international agreement, there is, perhaps, little that one country can do alone. The harmful effect of the restriction of credit contemplated by the Bank Charter Act of 1844 was much diminished by the development of the system of cheques, which in effect, greatly increased the currency. And, at the present time, anything tending to extend the use of cheques would be advantageous; for instance, reducing the stamps thereon or encouraging banking among classes who have not hitherto acquired the habit. But, since Great Britain now carries on a smaller fraction of the world's industry and finance than she did, an increase in the volume of cheque-money in this country alone would now produce less effect on world prices than when cheques first became common.

Perhaps the most promising and most effective action is to use every endeavour to lower the costs and charges in the sheltered industries, prices in which are still unduly high. At the end of 1927, while the agricultural index number was 138, and the Board of Trade index for wholesale commodities was 140, the cost of living, which is based on retail prices, was 168. This shows how the real cost of transport and distribution, sheltered activities, has increased since 1913 relatively to prices controlled by world competition. Every effort should be made at every possible opportunity to get the cost of sheltered occupations down more into conformity with those in competitive industries. The middleman and the retailer and their men perform useful functions, but they should share with the producer and the farm labourer some of the difficulties of bad times.

Finally, leaving these general monetary and economic considerations, let us ask what can be done within the special field of agriculture itself. Here, again, we are met by the well-known difference between the price paid by the consumer and that received by the producer. Where farmers have direct access to retail markets, as in many parts of the north of England, they still make profits. In the rural areas of the south, and especially in East Anglia, produce has to be moved to more populous districts, and therefore has to pass through the hands of middlemen before it can reach the consumer. For these areas the problem of marketing is all-important, and the efforts of the Ministry of Agriculture to investigate its possibilities and to improve existing practice is worthy of all support and encouragement. Co-operation for orderly marketing is not such a simple affair in England as in Denmark or Canada, which sell a few definite products to overseas markets and can direct all exports through a few easily controlled channels. Yet even in England prices of milk and of sugar-beet are fixed by collective bargaining, and perhaps this process may be extended as experience is gained.

Where foreign supplies dominate the market, as with meat or wheat or cheese, no co-operation between British farmers can maintain prices. Government action in control of imports could alone be effective. Such action, of course, has its dangers, but I think that careful enquiry into its possibility is worth undertaking.

Protection or free trade has less direct effect on prices than is usually supposed, and certainly less than rapid changes in the value of money. When money is appreciating fast, the increased intensity of foreign competition is another effect of the same cause, rather than a primary factor in the fall in prices. Protection could, of course, be made to help our farmers if what they sold were protected and not what they buy; but it is not practical politics; no party will touch it. Subsidies are less dangerous politically and less objectionable economically. Since political action has brought about deflation and lowered prices in unsheltered industries, perhaps farmers have a moral claim to assistance. But so have the "heavy" industries of coal, iron and steel, which work for export, and, doubtless, other trades would make out good claims. Hence, subsidies are almost as unlikely as protection.

The Government has promised to develop agricultural credit. Short-term credit, by which farmers can finance their crops while growing, is already given by the banks, though doubtless the introduction of some form of chattel mortgage would facilitate their operations. Long-term credit would be useful to those unfortunate occupying-owners who bought their farms during the time of high prices; but it should be observed that tenant farmers already get much long-term and some short-term credit from their landlords at rates cheaper than any Government can or ought to grant. A landowner lends to his tenants the capital value of their holdings at about 3 per cent., and generally gives six weeks free use of the interest when it is due under the name of rent.

The Government has also indicated that the system of local rating is to be brought under review, so that the farmer may hope for some further relief in this direction. Rates form a small fraction of a farmer's total outgoings, but for every little help we shall be grateful. Railway charges are a heavier burden, though they have not increased much more than has the average index number. Any reductions which the railways can give will be most welcome.

Finally, farmers themselves must strive to diminish costs of production in such small ways as are possible: to economise labour, and to make labour more effective by the use of improved machinery and by scientific management; to take advantage of all new knowledge put at their disposal by scientific experts and agricultural advisers; and, above all, to level bad farming as far as may be up to the standard of the best. Some gentle pressure to this end may perhaps be exerted by the members of The Surveyors' Institution.

Till there comes a time when governments realise the disastrous economic effects of changes in the general level of prices, and take monetary action to stop them, the most that can be done for agriculture is to further these and other small measures of relief. Taken singly they may seem insignificant; but collectively they may lighten somewhat the troubles of those who live on and by the land of England. Having suffered so heavily from the determination of successive governments to restore the pound sterling to its pre-war equivalent in gold, farmers may fairly ask for any possible palliatives for the disease which afflicts their industry. But the only radical cure is stabilisation—not of the price of individual products, but of the general price-level, that is, of the value of money.

THE AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION: ITS CAUSES AND POSSIBLE CURES.

Mr. C. B. Fisher, c.b.e. (Senior Vice-President), in the Chair.

The Hon. Edward Gerald Strutt, c.h. (Past-President), said it was with considerable modesty that he rose to propose a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Dampier-Whetham. He was not only a very distinguished man and a great economist, but also, he believed, a practical farmer, so whatever he said about farming was well worth attention. Personally he was sure everyone had listened with the greatest interest to the Paper, which showed in a closely reasoned way the effects of a change in the value of gold on the farming industry.

Farming had gone through periods of great depression at various times owing to the causes Mr. Dampier-Whetham had explained. Personally he had been able to confirm the curves shown in the Paper by looking at the balance sheets of his own farming operations, so that he had every confidence in what Mr. Dampier-Whetham said and agreed with every word. He had been farming for 52 years, and for the first 20 it seemed a hopeless business; but at that time he was a young man, full of confidence and hope. About 1896 things began to improve, the improvement continued for some years until before the war, and farmers were making a modest profit.

During the war, of course, anybody who was able to produce anything did very well; but the slump came in 1921, when farmers had a very bad time; it was the severest fall ever known. A fall was, however, expected, and prudent men prepared for it to a certain extent. He agreed with Mr. Dampier-Whetham that in 1924 things began to improve a little. He did not think that had been generally noticed. In January, 1925, he said to his son "I believe we "are going to have a better time," but then the gold standard was introduced a few months later, a reaction set in, and prices fell.

The present depression was so serious as to call for very strong remedial action. When Mr. Dampier-Whetham addressed the Farmers' Club, Lord Bledisloe suggested his Paper should be sent to every farmer in the kingdom. It might be even better, however, to send it to every banker in the country. Somehow or other the bankers had to be persuaded that the gold in the City was not the only thing to be considered and that the traders and merchants were not the only persons to be considered in England, but that the producers of such primary things as agricultural produce, coal and iron deserved some support.

Bankers who lived in great cities and came in contact principally with traders and merchants did not quite realise the needs of the country. They hardly realised, perhaps, what a big industry agriculture was in England. They admitted, of course, that it was a good thing for agriculture to be prosperous, but he did not think they realised the important part agriculture played in the industry of England. It was, he believed, the largest single industry in the country, and it purchased over £100,000,000 worth of manufactured goods from the manufacturers of the country. It was therefore an industry not to be lightly lost, and he felt that if the bankers knew the real facts they might view the matter in a different and better spirit.

Some people said there was no depression in agriculture. No doubt, as Mr. Dampier-Whetham said, there were parts of England, the thickly populated parts of Yorkshire, for example, where it was possible for farmers to prosper by acting as retailers as well as producers, but the profit came rather from retailing than production.

He had heard it said that one reason why there could be no agricultural depression was because so few farmers went bankrupt. 487 farmers went bankrupt in 1927. That seemed a small number, especially as 200 became bankrupt in 1920, when agriculture was very prosperous. In the ordinary way, however, farmers did not go bankrupt; those who did were those who lived beyond their means in their private capacity. Usually when a farmer found himself short of money he got a dealer to put some bullocks in his yard or to provide him with sheep, and carried on for a little while. If things got worse he would talk to his landlord, his manure merchant and his corn merchant, and say "I am very sorry, but I cannot go on any longer. What "can you do for me?" They did not want to make him bankrupt, so generally the landlord would wipe off a part of his rent—sometimes the whole—and the merchants would do their part. His friends would do something for him, and in the end he would go to live in a cottage on £50 or £100 a year. He was certain that was what usually happened. He had gone through the bad times in the eighties, when he regretted that many farmers had been ruined, but he did not remember a single farmer who actually went bankrupt. Townspeople and others often thought things were not so bad with farmers as they really were.

When the bankers received Mr. Dampier-Whetham's Paper, as he hoped they would, he trusted they would give it very careful consideration as they sat in their bank parlours. He could picture them sitting in their bank parlours with the picture of the pound and the dollar before them. They saw the pound looking the dollar in the face, and felt quite happy. Personally he did not want the pound to smile too much.

He was glad Mr. Dampier-Whetham had given some remedies. If the Federal Reserve Board could be persuaded to put out its gold, it would give some immediate relief. It would be interesting to know how long the reserves held by the Federal Reserve Board were likely to last, because Mr. Dampier-Whetham seemed to think things would be worse when they were exhausted. Would they last 5, 10, or 20 years?

Personally he was not in a position to say anything about the financial side of the matter. Mr. Dampier-Whetham went closely into the details of his suggested remedies, and did not seem to be very cheerful, though he thought, apparently, that joint action through the League of Nations might be helpful. That sounded certainly better, though Mr. Dampier-Whetham thought such action might come too late, when the farmers were all ruined.

There was one other question he wished to ask. If more gold was put out and there was an expansion of business, would there be any difficulty in selling the increased produce? Would the increased production due to the presence of more gold be able to find a market?

He had been struck by one paragraph in the Paper in which it was said that a good deal might be done by co-operation and collective bargaining, as had been done by the Farmers' Union in the milk and sugar-beet industries, but with such things as wheat, meat, and cheese, which were imported in large quantities from other countries, that would be impossible. Collective bargaining could only be brought about if imports were in some way controlled. The author had not given himself away so much elsewhere in the Paper, but he said that while there might be some danger in controlling imports the matter was worth careful enquiry. Personally he hoped that would be pressed for by the agricultural industry and by all who felt as Mr. Dampier-Whetham did about the gold position.

Then Mr. Dampier-Whetham mentioned that the farmers could do things for themselves. Everyone interested in agriculture must feel that that was important, and particularly members of The Surveyors' Institution, who had so many dealings with farmers. Farmers to-day were very different from what they were 20 or 30 years ago; they were out to get all the information they could and were very willing to take up new things. Personally he feared they were almost too willing to adopt all manner of advice. They got a good deal of it from people who knew nothing about their industry. They were, however, constantly visiting agricultural places of learning and asking for information, attending lectures, finding out the right manures to use, the right seeds to grow, and doing all they possibly could to learn. They were doing a great deal for themselves, and people who considered them a slow stupid lot were making a great mistake. There were foolish farmers—there were foolish people in all walks of life—but farmers as a class, and particularly the younger men, were putting their backs into their work.

There were other remedies which could be suggested, (he did not claim them all as his own), for relieving the immediate situation to some small extent. One was the abolition of rates on farm land and farm buildings. Another was the feeding of the Army and Navy on home-grown meat for at least the last six months of the year, when there was a glut of meat in England. Another was to fix a proportion of English wheat to be used in every mill, and say that every mill must use, say, 10 or 15 per cent. of English wheat. Another was to restrict the importation of condensed skim milk, which was supposed to be unhealthy.

Another was preferential parcel post rates for agricultural produce which would specially help small-holders. If they were charged about half the present rates it would help them very much. Another was the colouring of imported clover seeds, so that the consumer could know whether he was buying home or imported clover seeds. That was done in America, and he believed in France also. There was no doubt that the seed which came from Southern Europe was not nearly so good for sowing in this country as English seed. Another thing which The Institution had recommended was that the growers should be represented on the Food Council, so that they might have a chance of saying a word there.

He did not suppose all those things would be adopted by the Government. Some of them, however, might make a considerable immediate difference, though he did not suppose they would have so permanent an effect as a fall in the value of gold.

Some people talked about a duty on imported barley, but the Government had turned that down firmly, and he did not think it was much good pressing for it at present. What should be done was to impress on "the powers that be" that the depression in agriculture had been caused by Government action, and therefore some relief for the farmer was only fair and reasonable. That point of view needed pressing very strongly.

The Government, however, had not treated farmers so badly as it was the fashion to make out. The sugar-beet industry had proved a very useful aid to them, and had helped the light land arable farmers very considerably. The Government had also taken the right line with foot-and-mouth disease, and done all they could to crush it out; they had stuck bravely to the idea of slaughter, which was the only possible way of eradicating it. He hoped they would read Sir William Haldane's letter in the Times that morning, in which he mentioned how rampant foot-and-mouth disease was in South America, and how the constant outbreaks in this country might be caused by the importation of the bones of these animals.

A courageous effort by the Government and those in power was required to assist agriculture. It was very easy to find difficulties, and say "It can't be done," but some of the things he had mentioned could be done, and would do a good deal to help. It must always be borne in mind that, to a large extent, State action was responsible for the troubles through which agriculture was passing.

Speaking at the Farmers' Club, Lord Bledisloe expressed the view that party politics were a good deal to blame for the present troubles of agriculture, and said that at the present time he would on no account put money into English agriculture—a somewhat surprising statement for him to have made. That seemed to him a cry of despair, but he agreed with what Lord Bledisloe said about party politics, and with his suggestion for a round-table conference between all parties.

Thinking he would like to see what could be done, he secured a copy of the latest "Green Book" containing the Liberal policy on marketing. He began in the middle of the book, and read what was said about marketing, and was immensely pleased with it; he thought it first rate. He then went back to the beginning of the book and was horrified to find all the usual party things coming out. As in Ireland, there was to be a divided interest in land. Then, when the farmers said they were very sorry, but they could not produce the food expected of them at the present price and could anything be done, that request—which, after all, seemed a very reasonable one—apparently exasperated the writer of the book, and he gave his answer in a short, sharp and decisive way: "No, we will do nothing." He would not even go so far as to add a little English wheat to the bread which we ate, that was one of the things to which a decisive "No" was given. Personally he could not help thinking what the attitude had been ten years ago, when the farmers were asked to produce all the food they could. The attitude then was to entreat them to do things, to say to them "Do grow more food; we shall starve if you do not, "and we will never let you down."

He did not believe English people generally would support the attitude to which he referred. He did not believe the leader of the Liberal Party himself would have put those words in, because although he was mistaken and led away by bad advice on agricultural matters at the present moment, he was at bottom interested in and fond of agriculture, and wished to help it. Personally he firmly believed that the prosperity of agriculture was close to the hearts of the people of England, whether urban or rural, they were interested in it, and if measures were taken for its safety they would meet with unexpected support. He believed English people would like some English wheat in their bread, and would like to have their beer made from English barley and their milk obtained from English cows; they would like English meat to be given to English soldiers, and to have parcels of English produce straight from the farm. He did not believe they would think something very serious would happen if they supported such things, and he believed they would support them but for the unjust way in which politicians talked and frightened them. He felt, therefore, that party politics were responsible for a good deal of the trouble at the present moment.

The chief blame lay, as Mr. Dampier-Whetham said, with the gold position; next came party politics, and after that, perhaps, the weather.

In conclusion, he wished again to thank Mr. Dampier-Whetham for his very able address, and to say how appropriate it was that it should be given at a meeting of The Surveyors' Institution. Three months ago The Surveyors' Institution appointed a Committee to bring forward recommendations which would help agriculture, and among them was a rather tentative suggestion that the gold standard was one of the causes of the present agricultural depression. It was a great thing for The Institution to find that a suggestion made, perhaps, rather nervously, was confirmed by such a great economist as Mr. Dampier-Whetham. The members of The Institution numbered over 6,000, and had to do with almost the whole of the land of England, and were constantly in touch with it. Now that the cause of the agricultural depression was known so definitely, it was possible to hope that a remedy would be forthcoming, and would be successfully brought before the bankers and others who were responsible.

Mr. Robert Cobb (Fellow) said that if Mr. Strutt felt modest in rising to speak, he himself rose in fear and trepidation. He had been asked to second the vote of thanks to Mr. Dampier-Whetham for his admirable Paper, and he understood it was the custom for seconders to be brief. He intended to be so for more reasons than one. One reason was that, as an agriculturist, he knew nothing about currency—except that farmers, like himself, wanted gold individually.

He had been very interested by Mr. Dampier-Whetham's historical survey of the effects of finding gold in times gone by, because his theory was borne out absolutely by the position at the beginning of the war. Should America come to the rescue and release her accumulation of gold, it would be intensely interesting to see if the theory proved correct. If, however, that was the only cure for the present depression, he was afraid there was not much ground for hope.

Mr. Dampier-Whetham said the general public did not realise that the value of the sovereign altered, but personally he thought the experience of farmers was that the value of the sovereign did alter, and altered quickly. It was one price when the farmer sowed his corn and bought his manures and implements, and an entirely different one when the time came for selling the goods he produced. Mr. Dampier-Whetham referred to the economic lag. That was vastly different in agriculture to what it was in any other trade, not only on account of the time factor, but because the farmer could not change his crop when once he had put it in, whereas the manufacturer had a chance of changing his articles of manufacture if he saw he would lose money on them. The farmer, moreover, had no chance of putting up his price to the consumer, as his prices were completely controlled; and there, again, he differed from the ordinary manufacturer. Moreover, everything he had to pay for seemed to be "sheltered," whereas everything he produced was "unsheltered." It was impossible to make both ends meet on those lines.

In one respect he was disappointed with the Paper, because it set out to mention remedies. The politicians had tried to find remedies, and the farmers had tried to find them; and now it seemed a financier was to attempt it, but he was afraid he would go away without knowing what those remedies were. He feared Mr. Dampier-Whetham had not the courage of his convictions; he felt certain from what was said in the Paper that if one got him in the smoking-room one would find he was an ardent tariff reformer, although he did not say so in the Paper—perhaps he dared not. Personally he was a young man and he dared; he did think that in some shape or form tariff reform would help the farmer. It should be "Out with the "foreigner and on with the Englishman." Better marketing would help, and so would co-operation and retail shops; but wheat and meat were the mainstays of English agriculture, and it was necessary to cater for the problems they involved. He was not a financier nor a member of the Government, but he could not see why farmers had never received a little help under the Safeguarding of Industries Act; he did not see why some of the duty should not be taken off commodities like tea and cocoa, which we could not produce, and put on to wheat and meat which we could.

Again, Mr. Dampier-Whetham said the English landlord found capital for farmers at 3 per cent. He would like him to see the account of some of the estates in England and see if he could find 1 per cent.; he doubted if he could. That was an excellent reason against nationalisation, because the general public would not be satisfied with anything like 3 per cent., and so rents would increase. Some experience of that had been obtained with county council small holdings, to say nothing of the loss of the human touch which went with English landlordism.

He was afraid he had done nothing but find fault and had nothing to suggest, but in killing British agriculture one was killing England, and agriculture to-day was being killed entirely by the apathy and indifference of the town dwellers. One thing which would do a lot of good—though it might take a long time—was to educate the townspeople to believe that agriculture was some use to the old country, and that British food was as good as any foreign stuff that came in in tins from China.

He had great pleasure in seconding the vote of thanks to Mr. Dampier-Whetham for his Paper.

Colonel Sir GEORGE COURTHOPE, Bt. (Associate), thanked The Institution for the opportunity of saying a few words in support of the vote of thanks. Mr. Dampier-Whetham had rendered a great service in drawing attention, as he had that evening and on many occasions previously, as well as in a very able book he had published a few months ago, to the connection between the depression of our industries, including agriculture, and the gold position.

Personally he had arrived at the same conclusion as Mr. Dampier-Whetham, though by a totally different route. He was not an economist, though he did, many years ago, take the school of political economy for a pass degree at Oxford. He did not get the degree—he was sent down before he reached it—but he did pass in political economy. He did not attach much importance to that, however, because, although they had spent two years in trying to teach him to be a free trader, they had made him a protectionist. He had remained one ever since, and he saw no likelihood of changing. That, however, was merely a parenthesis, and of no importance in connection with what he wished to say that evening.

He had had a good deal to do with productive industry in one way and another, and, in looking round for cause and effect, was forced to the conclusion that one of the troubles was that there was not enough ready credit to go round. He thought it might be taken as axiomatic that under the present system the volume of domestic credit was regulated by the volume of currency in circulation, which, under the Bank Charter Act of 1844, was regulated by the reserve of gold.

Now, in practice what happened was as follows: The banks would allow only approximately 55 per cent., or very little more, of the amount of money which was on deposit with them to go out as domestic credit by way of loans. Under the present system they were probably wise in taking up that attitude. It was interesting, however, to look at the effect of that on agriculture. It was estimated (the figures he gave were not his own, but he believed they were generally accepted) that at the end of every summer on English farms there were growing crops and flocks and herds to the value of at least £400,000,000 sterling. The whole of the crops represented new wealth produced during the season, and a very large proportion of the flocks and herds represented new wealth also. At least £250,000,000 or £300,000,000 of that total figure was wealth newly produced during the year. It was not only wealth, but security for loans, but it did not give rise to any increase whatever in the amount of credit available not by a single penny. The amount of credit available was not regulated by the need for credit. Every one knew that during the summer months the farmer ran a little short of cash and badly needed credit, and the figures he had quoted showed that the security was there which would justify credit being given; but the amount available for credit was not regulated by the need for credit nor the value of the security, but by the amount on deposit. The bankers, in their wisdom—and he thought in so doing they were wise—had always attempted, roughly, to earmark rural deposits for rural credit, but at the time when the rural security was greatest, and the need for rural credit was greatest, the rural deposits were at their lowest ebb. There was a certain number of rural landowners who collected a certain amount of rent—he agreed it was nearer 1 per cent. than 3 —and some of them had something to put on deposit in November. A certain number of farmers who had sold their crops had something to put on deposit in the early winter also, but it was all drawn out for the spring cultivation, and consequently rural deposits, which were the measure of credit, were at their lowest ebb when rural security was greatest and the need for rural credit was greatest also.

That convinced him there was something wrong with the system, and if the matter was followed out it would be found, assuming the economic theory was correct—and economists all agreed on that point—that that was due to the present system of basing the amount of currency on gold.

The question was whether there was not a remedy for that state of affairs. He did not say it would be the sole and sovereign remedy; there were many other things which might help. There were the palliatives Mr. Strutt had mentioned; there was the protection which Mr. Cobb had mentioned, and with which he agreed, and there were many other things. It was important to find, however, whether one remedy for the position of agriculture and other productive industries should not be sought in the monetary régime itself.

He was inclined to agree with what he gathered to be Mr. Dampier-Whetham's view that it would be foolish at the present time to advocate the abolition of gold as a standard altogether; it was certainly very useful for international purposes. While gold was retained as a standard for international purposes, however, it might be possible to supplement it by domestic credits, supplementary domestic currency, based upon home production. He said "based on "home production," because what was wanted in agriculture was that at the time when that extra £300,000,000 worth of new wealth was being produced on English farms there should be more securities available—call them what they liked: credit notes, bills of exchange, or what not, but at any rate negotiable instruments of some kind—which would be exchangeable into currency which could be issued on the security of that new production of wealth, and which would enable bankers to issue more credit to agriculture at the time when it was most wanted—in the summer—against the new security which the growing crops and the flocks and herds provided.

Personally he could think of no valid objection to such a scheme, though Mr. Dampier-Whetham, with his greatly superior knowledge, might discover obstacles he could not envisage. He wished to ask, however, whether a remedy could not be found in that direction, and he suggested at least one might do this: the Government might be pressed, as it had been by various other people, and notably by Mr. Reginald McKenna, the best known banker at the present day, to set up a really first-class inquiry into the operation of the Bank Charter Act of 1844. Agriculturists and surveyors, though they might have their opinions, and probably good ones, could not pretend to lay down the law as to exactly what should be done in the way of varying or supplementing the present gold standard, but they could at least with perfect safety say to the Government: "We "think something is wrong. We think there is a case for "inquiry. Please set up a first-class body to investigate "the question, and see whether we should not either vary "the gold standard or supplement it by issuing additional "currency or additional credit notes based upon home production."

There were many other matters one was tempted to discuss on an occasion such as the present, but it would not be fair for him to take up more time. In conclusion, however, he wished most cordially to thank Mr. Dampier-Whetham for the excellent work and public service he was doing by drawing attention to the question. He hoped he would go on calling attention to what was in fact a very urgent and critical matter.

Mr. F. J. Brown (Member of Council) wished to join with others in paying a tribute to Mr. Dampier-Whetham for his Paper, because he thought it was a very plucky thing to write it. For the last four years hundreds and thousands of men had discussed the subject and tried to find a remedy for agricultural depression, but up to the present time he thought no one had hit the nail on the head. Mr. Dampier-Whetham, however, had probably come nearer to doing so than anyone else.

Personally he was a disciple of Mr. Dampier-Whetham. He had read his book and every letter he had written to the papers, and the more he read the more he came to the conclusion that the question of the gold standard was at the bottom of the present agricultural depression, and that nothing else exercised so profound an effect.

He had tried to explain it to some of his agricultural friends in the following way. He said to them: "During " the war goods were up in the air and the sovereign was " down below, at 13*s*. or 14*s*. In those days the goods said " to the gold 'If you want me, bring up 25 shillings with " you, and you can have me.' Now the position has changed, " and it is the gold that is up in the air and the goods that " are down below, and the gold sovereign says 'If you want " me, come and fetch me, but bring up 25 shillings' worth.' "

That, to his mind, was what was going on at the present time. It was necessary to find so much more goods to obtain that sovereign. That was where the difficulty lay, and it had been excellently illustrated in a Paper read by the Secretary of The Institution in 1892. That Paper dealt with exactly the same subject as that now under consideration, and if it had been read that evening the members might have thought it had been prepared the day before. It was uncanny. It was read at the Session 1892-93, and in every word it showed what a far-seeing man Mr. Goddard was, for it was as true to-day as when it was first written. It showed that at that time there was a deep depression from which the country did not know how to escape, and it would, if read that day, have answered the purpose as well as Mr. Dampier-Whetham's.

Mr. Lloyd George, Lord Bledisloe and others apparently shared Mr. Dampier-Whetham's view that the gold standard had hit agriculture harder than any other industry in the country. That was the view of men who had thought the subject out, and if such men put that view forward he for one was ready to accept it.

To show how little was really known about the subject, twelve months ago he asked the President of the Farmers' Union what they were doing at headquarters about the gold standard question. The reply was that they were doing nothing, and when he asked why, he was told "Nobody "there understands it or has ever heard about it." On the one hand Mr. Lloyd George and others were saying that the gold standard was hitting agriculture harder than anything else, and, on the other, the great body which represented the farmers, the National Farmers' Union, said they had never heard about it, and knew nothing about the subject. That showed how much ignorance there was on the subject, and how difficult it was to find a cure. He was quite sure that if it had not suited the great financiers to have the gold standard in its present form it would never have been established on its present basis. It suited them to have the gold standard, and he was afraid they did not consider agriculture sufficiently to allow that standard to be altered.

On the subject of remedies, he would like to se agriculture taken right out of the political arena and recognised as a national matter, quite apart from politics. All the parties should confer together, as there were many branches of home production which could be fostered and encouraged without appreciably raising the cost of the product. The prohibition of the importation of certain products from the Continent, which were excluded to guard our herds and flocks, lent point to the conclusion that such things could be produced inside the country if the opportunity was given. The import prohibition to which he referred had not led to harmful results; the only result had been that the price of the particular product in question had fallen.

Cereals had become unprofitable and were likely to remain so, except as an adjunct to other things. So far as milk was concerned, this country could be independent of any imported supply in any normal season. Though the home supply was hedged round by many restrictions (and rightly, from the point of view of the health of the nation) there was little evidence that imported tinned milk received any such supervision at its source, and if an inquiry were conducted in the same way as in the case of foot-and-mouth disease, glaring facts might come to light. Foot-and-mouth disease was rampant on the Continent. Farmers in this country could produce every drop of milk that was required if they were allowed to do so, and if milk were put on the same footing as that particular article which had brought disease into the country. Restrictions governing milk production were very severe in England. There had to be so many windows and so many doors; drains had to be provided outside, and so on. Foreign milk, however, was not subject to those restrictions.

It was to be hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not make another raid on the Road Fund to help to pay what was taken off the land, but it was to be hoped he would give some relief in the matter of taxes on the land, which had always been looked on as a tax on the raw material of the farmer. It would be only an act of justice to afford some relief in that connection.

The sheltered industries had been and were having the best of it. An attempt should be made to enlist the good feeling of the men in the sheltered industries and get them to come to the help of those in unsheltered industries by agreeing to a gradual lowering of wages, so that commodities might be obtained at a lower price.

Mr. Strutt mentioned several things which might be regarded as palliatives, but he did not think they were of very great importance compared with the factors Mr. Dampier-Whetham had mentioned. They would all help, however, for "many a mickle makes a muckle," and so it was to be hoped they would be given a trial and assist in the solution of the difficulty.

Personally he thought there were many bright spots in England; the depression did not cover the whole country. The eastern counties were in the doldrums, but there were several ways in which agriculture might become more prosperous, and he did not think better times were far off. It would not come by leaps and bounds, but in all probability improvement was ahead if all interests pulled together. The scientific research which was now going on would be of great assistance, and he looked to that to find a solution for many difficulties. Time did not, however, allow him to develop that point of view.

Mr. Alan Arnold (Member of Council) said that, like everyone else, he had been very interested in the Paper presented by Mr. Dampier-Whetham and in Sir George Courthope's remarks. Personally he proposed to take shelter behind a remark of Lord Bledisloe at the Farmers' Club meeting, to the effect that no one, unless he was an expert, should attempt to speak on the subject of the gold standard and currency.

He knew very little about the subject, although it might be thought he should know something, as he had the honour to be land agent to Mr. Dampier-Whetham's Dorset estate.

It was sometimes said that the Government had done very little to help agriculture, but he was not one of those who altogether agreed with that view; he thought the present and previous Governments had done a good deal from time to time for agriculture. The subsidy on sugar-beet had been of assistance. The Government had also helped on the question of rating, and had assisted schemes for the improvement of arterial drainage, which he looked on as a very important matter in many of the counties of England. The Government could, however, do more, and if they intended to do more, they should lose no time in taking the matter in hand. He was an optimist, and always had been, but sometimes he saw the red light; and he thought that if the agricultural depression was allowed to go any further, the country would be placed in a very serious position.

He did not know what to suggest in order to help the industry to recover, but he felt the greatest difficulty the farmer had to meet at the present time was the difficulty of marketing his produce. The farmer was up against a ring of very clever men wherever he went; he had to go into the market with 10 to 1 against him every time. The conditions under which he had to sell his produce were entirely different from the conditions under which his wife went to buy hers. The two must be brought into better alignment if the present depression in agriculture was to be successfully overcome. To take the case of the farmer's wife doing her marketing at the end of the week, she probably finished up at the butcher's shop. The butcher would almost rush at her to ask her what she wanted, and as soon as she decided on a leg of mutton she was told she could have it at 1*s.* 6*d.* a pound. She mildly took it, paid for it and went home. When the farmer himself, on the other hand, went to sell his produce, he wandered gingerly into the corn exchange, went up to the only man he could go to—his own corn merchant —and, as a rule, did not wait for the corn merchant to say to him "What have you to sell?" but went to him and said "I have 50 quarters of wheat to sell; what can you give "me for it?"

That condition of affairs had to be altered, though how it should be altered he did not know if anyone present that evening could suggest. It might be very foolish of him even to make a suggestion, but it seemed to him the Government ought to appoint an organiser; not a man worth £1,000 a year, but a man worth many thousands a year, a Geddes or a Selfridge, or a man of that type, a man who knew how to organise. It might then be possible to organise the markets of England in such a way that the farmers could be told when and where to send their produce. If only it were possible to arrive at that state of affairs, a more rapid improvement in the state of agriculture might be brought about than was likely to result by any steps the Government could take on the gold standard question.

In conclusion, he wished to thank Mr. Dampier-Whetham, and to say how much he, in common with others, appreciated the very great amount of trouble Mr. Dampier-Whetham had taken in preparing his Paper.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. C. B. Fisher, C.B.E., Senior Vice-President), in putting the vote of thanks, said he would have preferred it if the title of the Paper had been "The "Effect of Monetary Instability upon Agriculture," as it was on the occasion when Mr. Dampier-Whetham addressed the Farmers' Club, because that limited the subject to one point, whereas the actual title had opened the way to many other points which, while of interest, did not bear on the principal matter Mr. Dampier-Whetham discussed.

He was sure all those present had appreciated very much the fact that Mr. Dampier-Whetham had addressed The Surveyors' Institution as well as the Farmers' Club, because though not all the members of The Institution were farmers, they were all interested in agriculture, and very many of them were anxious to ascertain what the question of stability really meant. In trying to find that out for himself he had endeavoured to reduce it to its simplest form, and had put it in this way, that if gold was the standard of value—and it was the only legal method of exchange throughout the greater part of the world—and if the sovereign was the symbol of exchange, and he possessed one sovereign, and nobody else had any, he could buy the world; but if nine other people had sovereigns he could buy only one-tenth of the world. That meant, putting it in simple language, that the more sovereigns there were the more competition there was for what was produced in the world, and therefore things became dearer. He thought that was, perhaps, the most elementary and the simplest way of looking at it.

That there was a scarcity of gold at the present time no one could deny, but possibly the scarcity was much greater than it would otherwise be on account of the fact that America was hoarding such a vast amount. He understood the amount was in the neighbourhood of £100,000,000, and buried completely for the time being just as though it had not been found. He would like to see active steps taken by the Government to make America disgorge it, but he gathered the author thought the Federal Reserve Board was in communication with the authorities in this country, and was perhaps inclined to do so. He did not see why the whole of the trade of this country should be affected adversely for a long period because the Federal Reserve Board wished, for its own purposes, to limit supplies to the outer world.

Some good might be done if others could be convinced that it was the right policy to endeavour to find a solution in connection with the gold question, and he strongly supported the suggestion that the report of Mr. Dampier-Whetham's previous address to the Farmer's Club, and the very interesting speeches delivered on that occasion by Messrs. Enfield, Hasler and A. H. Brown, should be broadcast, not necessarily amongst farmers, but, as Mr. Strutt had said, amongst bankers. There had been nothing more convincing or more logical since the days of Euclid than Mr. Dampier-Wetham's address on that occasion, and the speeches which were made afterwards.

He would now put the resolution of thanks to the meeting, with the greatest confidence that it would be carried unanimously.

The vote of thanks was then put, and carried by acclamation.

Mr. W. C. D. DAMPIER-WHETHAM, in the course of his oral reply, said he found many of the remarks made in the course of the discussion not only interesting but provocative, and he wished he had the time to explain why, in spite of Mr. Cobb, he was still a free trader, though not, he trusted, a bigoted one. He agreed that nascent industries might be protected, but England, after all, lived largely upon exports, and it would not help the coal trade, the heavy iron trade, the steel trade, or the engineering industry, to increase the cost of what they bought and so increase their costs of production when they had to sell in the markets of the world. That, however, was another story. He was quite sure that if protection were introduced in England, the things the farmer had to buy would be protected, and the things he had to sell would not.

With regard to the gold standard and the City of London, it must not be forgotten that the gold standard had a very real advantage. The bankers worked with one eye on the foreign exchanges, and to have what was really an international currency or standard of value did facilitate foreign trade. That must not be overlooked. The men who were in control of the financial policy of the country might seem perverse to those concerned with production, but the great bankers were perfectly honest and honourable men, who were trying to do what they could for the benefit of the country as a whole, though sometimes, he thought, they made mistakes in policy.

He fully agreed with what Mr. Cobb and Mr. Brown had said about sheltered and unsheltered industries. Owing to the rise in prices and the subsequent fall, the strong trade unions in the sheltered industries, and those to whose interest it was to keep up the profits thereof, had been able to maintain their price-level higher than in the case of unsheltered industries. Consequently the unsheltered industries had to pay the higher prices demanded, while themselves obtaining only low prices for what they sold. He thought it was desirable to do everything possible to get prices lowered in the sheltered industries, but it was not easy.

Mr. Brown had referred to rates. People often overlooked what a very small proportion of the farmer's outgoings was represented by rates—only 3 per cent. or so. He was not despising small things, but much relief could not be looked for in that direction.

He agreed fully with all his friend Mr. Arnold had said; it was true that the farmer was in a very weak economic position. He would like to carry on the story of what happened when the farmer went into the corn exchange; Mr. Arnold had forgotten the end of the tale. The farmer went up to the corn merchant, as Mr. Arnold had told them, and said he had some corn to sell. After that, the corn merchant asked "What do you want for it?" and the unfortunate farmer had to reply "Well, I suppose whatever "you are pleased to give me!"

Mr. Goddard's work on the same subject thirty odd years ago was, as Mr. Brown had pointed out, a very remarkable forecast of what was being said that evening, and he advised everyone to read it. It was an extremely good account of the position during the last great depression.

Mr. Fisher was, he thought, rather unkind to the Federal Reserve Board when he said they were hoarding gold and ought to disgorge it. The position was simply due to the fact that, during certain years, America was the best market for gold, and gold, of course, went there. When Mr. Fisher said the troubles of this country were due to the Federal Reserve Board holding up the gold, in a sense, of course, that was true. If they allowed currency and credit to expand in America, the prices of world commodities would rise; but it was necessary to look at the question from their point of view also. On the whole, America was very flourishing at present, and if currency and credit were to expand faster than business grew, they would get a boom—which they did not want—followed by the inevitable slump. They must not be blamed for what they did; from their point of view it was sound policy. Also it was a very useful experiment in economics.

Sir George Courthope had made some extremely interesting suggestions which he would like to think over before answering. The problem of currency was very complicated. He was sorry that the Oxford economists, in trying to make Sir George a free trader, had only succeeded in turning him into a protectionist, but he regarded the tariff controversy as very much less important than the question of monetary policy.

He thanked The Institution very warmly for their vote of thanks.

Mr. DAMPIER-WHETHAM has sent the following written reply:—

In supplementing the short reply, which was all that time allowed at the meeting, I will begin by answering Mr. Strutt.

I think it is impossible to say how long the present excess gold reserves of the Federal Reserve Banks will last. It depends on the rate of growth of American business and foreign investment. For the last six months the flow has turned, and gold is leaving the United States. Foreign loans are sanctioned in New York because they stimulate American exports. They also benefit the world at large, and it is much to be hoped that no ill-instructed outcry will arise in America about gold leaving the country.

Mr. Strutt also asks whether, if production were increased by a rise in prices, the new goods would find a market. Improved prosperity would increase purchasing power, by absorption of the unemployed, by a rise of wages in the unsheltered industries, and in other ways. Elastic trades will therefore find demand expanding. Agriculture, it is true, is not very elastic—the consumption of food does not readily increase. But neither does production, and it is unlikely to expand faster than its markets in a time of rising prices.

Sir George Courthope wishes, while maintaining a gold standard, to supplement our currency for internal trade by issuing notes on the security of growing crops. I think the problem of adjusting the supply of currency and credit to the needs of business deserves, as Sir George says, an impartial enquiry by the strongest committee the Government can get together, and I hope he will use his very great influence to secure such an enquiry. I am not prepared to say—I do not suppose Sir George himself would say—in advance of that enquiry, that his suggestion gives the only or even the best possible solution, but at least it deserves careful consideration. If I understand it aright, it comes, in effect, to improving existing facilities for supplying farmers with short-term credit on the security of their crops, while at the same time raising both the customary ratio of banking advances to deposits and also the limit of bank notes and currency notes at present fixed by the Bank Charter Act and a Treasury Minute. At any rate, I think those measures would produce the same effect. The ratio of advances to deposits might be increased by the joint stock banks if they thought it safe. But joint stock banks have no control of currency; that is the function of the Bank of England and, since 1914, of the Treasury. If Treasury notes are replaced by bank notes, the Bank Charter Act of 1844 will certainly need reconsideration.

I am afraid that, as long as a gold standard is maintained, the difficulties which face any one country in doing anything effective are very great. The depression is worst in those products which have a world-market, and measures tending to increase internal currency, and thus primarily to put up internal prices, would only increase the total of the world's currency by a very small fraction, so that the effect on world prices would be small. Thus, while a gold standard is maintained, I am inclined to look to an international agreement to economise gold as the best means of saving us from a long period of falling prices.

If we are prepared to follow Mr. Maynard Keynes and drop the gold standard, we can have a currency managed nationally so as to maintain the internal price-level approximately constant. Foreign exchanges would then fluctuate, as they did during and after the war. Personally I think this a far less evil than a fluctuating price-level, because those who manage foreign trade and foreign exchange operations are specialists who can adjust their business to varying exchanges and insure against harmful movements in value.

But the gold standard is not only a real benefit to the City of London, it is also the traditional method of carrying on banking business. Hence, to propose its abolition arouses not only reasoned criticism but a certain amount of unreasonable opposition, based on a natural dislike of change. Therefore I think there is more hope of international agreement to economise gold than there is of persuading our financial authorities to base our national currency and credit on some unfamiliar and untried basis. But circumstances may alter, and I reserve every right to change my opinion.

NOTE.

Mr. Dampier-Whetham, when introducing his Paper, made the following addition :—

I should like to amplify on one point what I have said in my Paper, because I do not think I have emphasised sufficiently the general deleterious effects of a falling price-level. Of course, if a lowering in the price of commodities is obtained honestly by improvements in technique, or by a cheapening of transport, and so on, it is all to the good. That is a real increase in wealth. You are getting your goods at a less expenditure of labour because they are cheaper to produce or to distribute. A momentary fall, on the other hand, a fall in price which is produced by a restriction of currency and credit, is bad. It means that purchasing power is less than it ought to be. Moreover, all the time the price level is falling—which is only another way of saying the value of money is increasing—the burden of fixed charges, such as mortgage interest, rent or labour, if wages are fixed in terms of money, is growing greater. Money is, of course, only a counter ; the real things are the commodities and services which money has to buy, and in terms of those things, of commodities and services, the burden of fixed charges is growing greater all the time money is increasing in value. That is one reason why, when the price level is falling, even though it is falling slowly, the consequences are very serious, not only to agriculture, but to industry in general. No industry can flourish for long against a steadily sagging price level due to monetary causes ; it is the most depressing thing in the economic world.

THE REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON LAND DRAINAGE.

A discussion on the Report will take place at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 7*th May*, 1928.

The following summary of the main recommendations of the Commission is set out as an aid to discussion:—

(1) That the general drainage law should be consolidated and amended.

(2) That a central drainage authority be set up for each catchment area, where necessary, and that a list of such areas be scheduled to any Land Drainage Bill, power being reserved to the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries to add or exclude areas.

(3) That where a catchment area authority is unnecessary, the county or county borough council should be empowered to execute minor drainage works, and to rate either the whole or part of their administrative areas in respect thereof.

(4) That where a catchment area is too small to justify an independent authority, it should be grouped with a neighbouring area.

(5) That where an estuary into which more than one river discharges requires a separate authority, the authorities of the catchment areas for these rivers should set up a joint committee for drainage purposes.

(6) That the Thames Conservancy should have the powers of a catchment area authority.

(7) That the county councils and county borough councils within a catchment area should be required to prepare a scheme for the constitution of the catchment area authority and to obtain the approval of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries thereto. In default the Minister should himself constitute the Authority.

(8) That, for the purpose of constituting the first authority in each catchment area, the Minister should determine provisionally the boundaries of the lowlands and uplands in each catchment area, and their respective proportions of chargeability.

(9) That thereafter the authority should delimit the boundaries of lowlands and uplands and fix the incident of rating between them, subject to confirmation by the Minister.

(10) That the members of a catchment area authority (except in special cases) should not exceed 30 in number, and be, as to two-thirds, representatives of the county councils and county borough councils within the catchment area, the remaining one-third consisting of members elected by the internal drainage authorities.

(11) That allocation of members among the county councils and county borough councils should be determined by their relative contributions to the requirements of the catchment area authority.

(12) That the jurisdiction of all subsidiary drainage authorities on the main channel of a river should be abolished and that the catchment area authority should be the sole drainage authority for the main channel of the river and be clothed with supervisory powers (in order to secure co-ordination of effort) over the internal drainage authorities.

(13) That the catchment area authority should be empowered to make contributions to the funds of the internal drainage authorities.

(14) That the powers of county councils under the Land Drainage Acts should be transferred to the catchment area authorities where appointed, but that county councils operating under special Acts should retain the powers conferred upon them by such Acts.

(15) That where the schemes of catchment area authorities conflict, there should be an appeal to the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.

(16) That the catchment area authority should have power to enter into arrangements with navigation and other authorities for the regulation of the main channel of the river.

(17) That if a catchment area authority defaults, its power should be exercised by the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.

(18) That the catchment area authority should prepare a scheme for the reorganisation of the internal drainage authorities, their constitution in some cases being modified.

(19) That the catchment area authority should have power to group internal drainage authorities and set up new authorities where none exist and are required.

(20) That commissions of sewers and obsolete or moribund draining authorities should be abolished, but replaced, where necessary, by new elective internal draining authorities.

(21) That differences arising between the catchment area authority and the internal drainage authorities should be referred for settlement to the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.

(22) That all drainage rating should be based on annual value.

(23) That the area of benefit for main channel works should, in future, comprise all hereditaments within a catchment area.

(24) That the catchment area authority should precept for the amounts required on the county councils and the county borough councils wholly or partly within their area.

(25) That, as regards rating, urban areas should either be subject to separate individual decision by the catchment area authority, or, if dealt with on the same basis, should be rated as if they were situate in the uplands.

(26) That the rates for internal drainage should be assessed by the internal drainage authorities, and collected by the local rating authorities.

(27) That, from any decision of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries, there should be an appeal to a special tribunal to be set up for the purpose by the Lord Chancellor or the Lord Chief Justice.

(28) That, in face of the prevailing agricultural depression, caution should be exercised in carrying out extensive drainage schemes, and that in certain cases assistance from the Exchequer would be justifiable.

A DISCUSSION took place on

THE REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON LAND DRAINAGE.

Mr. E. S. Cox (President) in the Chair.

Mr. C. B. FISHER, C.B.E. (Senior Vice-President), said that Mr. Bidwell and himself gave evidence before that Commission on 26th May of last year on behalf of The Institution, but had not had an opportunity of discussing the question with the Council before giving evidence. The recommendations of the Royal Commission were very much on the lines of the evidence which he and Mr. Bidwell gave. He hoped, therefore, that their evidence would appeal to the members of The Institution as having been more or less correct.

The Royal Commission was appointed on 26th March, 1927, and he thought they were to be congratulated on having completed their work and made their report by 5th December of that year. The Commission was probably one of the most expeditious Royal Commissions that had ever taken place, and he hoped and thought that the results of their enquiry and their Report would be regarded to a very great extent as satisfactory. The Institution had the satisfaction of knowing that Lord Bledisloe, an Honorary Member of The Institution, was the Chairman of the Royal Commission, and that Sir George Courthope, an Associate of Council, and Col. Sir Francis Drummond, a Fellow of The Institution, were also on the Royal Commission.

The terms of reference of the Royal Commission were:—

> "To enquire into the present law relating to land drainage in England and Wales and its administration throughout the country, to consider and report whether any amendment of the law is needed to secure an efficient system of arterial drainage without any undue burdens being placed on any particular section of the community, and to make recommendations having regard to all the interests concerned."

The Report went very fully into the past history of drainage, but he would deal with it briefly. There were 361 drainage authorities in England and Wales in addition to authorities which had been appointed under the Land Drainage Act of 1926, the earliest drainage authority having been set up in the reign of Henry III.

The Land Drainage Act of 1861 provided—

> "That the powers of the Commissioners and of all previous Commissions set up under the earlier Acts should extend to certain definite acts or duties, with certain restrictions and limitations imposed upon them.

> These acts or duties may be divided briefly into the following: (1) The maintenance of existing works (2) the improvement of existing works; (3) the construction of new works."

The Act provided—

> "That generally a rate for maintenance work should be an occupier's rate, whereas rates for improvement works or new works (above a certain cost) should be levied upon owners."

After some intermediate legislation, the next Act of importance was the Land Drainage Act of 1918, which enabled the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries "to "constitute drainage districts either on the petition of the "proprietors of at least one-tenth of the area concerned, or on "the petition of the council of any county in which lay any "part of the land proposed to be affected, or on the Ministry's "own initiative without any petition."

That Act further provided—

> "Drainage authorities governed by the general law were expressly authorised to rate by acreage or on annual value, and provision was made for differential rating or for exemption from rating of part of any drainage area."

In the recommendations of the Royal Commission it would seem that they were against rating on acreage as a general basis.

In 1926 there was a further Act which conferred the powers granted to the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, under the Act of 1918, on the county councils instead of the Ministry of Agriculture, who were also given powers to require the cleansing of drains where an obstruction exists. The Commission were—

> "forced to the conclusion that the amendment of all the relevant statutes presents an impossible task, and that satisfactory results can only be obtained by the repeal of all existing drainage legislation embodied in Public Acts, and the enactment of a single comprehen> sive statute. We recommend that this course should be followed."

He was in entire agreement with that recommendation.

Dealing with the question of benefit the Commission said:—

> "The principle of all drainage rating is on the basis of benefit, which has been construed to mean some definite and obvious profit to the land itself"; and further that while they did not suggest the doctrine of benefit should be altogether abandoned, they considered its proper and fitting interpretation was somewhat wider than had hitherto been placed upon it. They continued:—

> "The benefit of land drainage to any given area is not confined to the discharge of water beyond its own boundaries, but includes some responsibility for its passage to the sea.
> Such an interpretation of benefit would ensure an equitable contribution from the higher lands which pass their waters into the lower areas and make the task of the lowlanders more difficult. It is sometimes maintained that landowners whose lands drain themselves naturally by gravitation have a natural right to discharge their water into the lower levels, and that the condition of the main channels into which their water flows is not their concern.
> This argument does not impress us. The same amount of water per acre (or possibly more) falls upon upland as upon lowland, and has to pass away from both to the sea, through the river as its outfall. Each natural river in the country is the artery which drains the lands in its catchment area."

They refer to the fact that as far back as 1887 a Select Committee of the House of Lords was appointed to consider the waterlogged condition of the land. That Committee reported to the following effect:—

> "There does not appear to be any injustice in rating uplands to the maintenance of a channel to which they > contribute their quota of waters, and the case is still stronger with respect to towns which are at present exempt from taxation for this purpose. . . . . Having regard to these considerations, and looking to the extreme difficulty of rating lands according to the benefits derived, the Committee think that the rates should be distributed over the whole area of a watershed, the lands and houses below the flood level being rated at a higher amount than those above it, and other graduations and exceptions being made to meet particular cases."

That was the first time that it was officially recognised that benefit might accrue to the whole area of the watershed.

The Royal Commission further emphasised the House of Lords' Committee's opinion:—

> "Again, during the last century the population of these islands has multiplied exceedingly. Villages have grown into towns, and the population has become so dense that for hygienic purposes artificial systems of sewerage have of necessity been resorted to, and foreign water supplies installed, drawn either from other catchment areas at a horizontally distant source or vertically from deep wells fed from pervious rock outcrops, so that from some large towns many millions of gallons of effluent are daily voided into the outfall river, with results in time of flood which may be better imagined than described."

But with the following reservation:—

> "On the other hand, there must be taken into account the position of urban areas, particularly those which are situate upon or close to the sea or a tidal estuary, and which discharge all their waters, whatever be their source, direct into it."

He thought he could trace the view of a member of the Royal Commission who, when cross-examining him, asked his view with regard to such a place as Brighton, which was said to discharge its effluent right into the sea and to do no damage to anybody.

The present area of rating was obviously too restricted; for instance, there was the case of the Arundel Commissioners, which was cited in the Report. Their area as a rateable area was only 8,137 acres, while the catchment area of the River Arun comprised no less than 236,800 acres. The Ouse had a rateable area of 469,000 acres, while the river had a catchment area of some 2,000,000 acres. The Commission said:—

> "Nothing has been more striking in the course of our enquiry than the revelation of the complete mutual independence of the various drainage authorities over the country."

That was really the whole difficulty of the situation. He thought no one could deny that the rivers and waterways of England were in an extremely bad state at the present time; and if anything was to be done, the chief difficulty which had to be met was that of apportioning the burden of rating.

A further difficulty was that of collecting drainage rates. The Commission said:—

> "Many of our witnesses have stressed the importance of including drainage rates in the said demand note as ordinary rates and arranging for their collection by the rating authorities operating under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925."

This meant that the method of rating should be upon the assessable rateable value and not upon the full rateable value of land and houses equally.

The Royal Commission said that the two main issues which had emerged from the investigations as to the basis of any amendment of drainage law were (1) the necessity of having a supreme authority in each catchment area, and (2) the prime importance of the extension of the area of and alteration in the basis of rating for drainage purposes. And they were of opinion that—

> "The catchment area is the proper drainage unit, and by catchment area we mean 'the whole of the > land which directs the drainage towards one river' ending in the sea"; with the reservation that—

> "The Thames Conservancy should be given over their area all the drainage powers and duties which we recommend should devolve upon a catchment area authority."

The supreme authority for each catchment area should cover the area upon which the water fell which ran into a certain river, including the borough and the urban districts, and should be managed and governed by an authority created by the county councils and of the urban councils or borough councils in the districts. He agreed with the Commission's suggestion that the number of members should not be too large, and should not exceed 30:—

> "The allocation of members among the county and county borough councils concerned should be determined by the relative monetary contributions of each to the requirements of the catchment area authority."

In his evidence he recommended that the rate should be levied equally on the reduced county assessable value of the county and the total assessable value of the boroughs. He had asked Mr. Tomlinson, the water engineer of Northampton, to be present that evening, and he hoped he would be able to speak, and to say whether those ideas on the question of the rating of the boroughs as compared with the agricultural districts were fair and reasonable.

One difficulty had arisen recently owing to the proposal to relieve the land from rates altogether, which he was sorry to say was postponed for 18 months, but which he hoped Sir George Courthope would induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to expedite. If anything was to be done in connection with the rivers it would fall on the rates, and the land was to be entirely relieved from rates, so that it might be asked where the money was coming from.

The Ouse Drainage Bill of 1927 suggested, in connection with county boroughs, that they should pay upon the basis of acreage and that the basis should be 2*d.* per acre for uplands and 6*d.* per acre for lowlands. The acreage of the borough of Northampton was only 3,469 acres, as compared with 581,000 acres for the whole of the administrative county of Northampton. If the towns were rated on that basis, therefore, they would get off for practically nothing.

The Commission went on to say:—

> "The arguments in favour of national expenditure upon land drainage are particularly strong as regards the effective clearance of detritus and sea-borne silt at the mouths of the estuaries and larger rivers and the preservation of sea-walls and embankments against excessive and violent encroachment of tidal water."

He thought the argument that the Exchequer should be responsible for all the tidal waters was emphasised by the Land Drainage Act, 1918, which said:—

Evidently when that Act was passed it was thought desirable that Parliament should maintain some control over the tidal waters. Personally he was in favour of the whole of the tidal waters being paid for by the National Exchequer. He did not think it would be possible to ask for that work to be paid for either by the rateable value of land or by those who were paying rates in urban districts.

In his evidence he drew special attention to the reason why urban districts should pay, and he took the instance of the county of Northampton. He pointed out that at the time of the institution of the Nene Drainage Commissioners, who had to do with the chief river in Northamptonshire, the county towns and urban districts drew their water supply from wells in their own districts. That was about 1850. When the population increased they naturally had to go to Parliament for power to go outside their own districts to obtain water for domestic purposes. Most of them in Northamptonshire took powers to form reservoirs, and they took from the catchment area as much of the water as fell on the catchment area as they required, and they went to the expense of impounding that water in those reservoirs, but they never have paid for the water itself. At that time, of course, the number of houses was very small in proportion to what it was at the present time. At the present time there was a very large area of roofs and roads which were impervious to water, and the effect of that was that they wanted to get rid of that water as quickly as possible. The situation was not as it was in the days when the land absorbed a great deal of the water. The urban districts had, therefore, their own storm-water schemes for getting rid of their surplus storm water as quickly as possible. They had also their sewerage schemes for getting rid of the surplus domestic supplies. He therefore maintained before the Royal Commission that every man, woman and child in a district such as Northampton, or any other urban district, benefited from the fact that of the water falling on that watershed they were enabled to take what they wanted and dispose of the rest as easily as possible.

He had figures with him, which he would have liked to give had there been time, as to the comparative population of places like Northampton and the county in which they were situated and with regard to the present rateable basis, but he maintained that if everyone were to bear his fair share on the basis of the assessable value of the county and the boroughs, the amounts would be so infinitesimal that if they were levied by the present rating authorities, they would be felt hardly at all, and everyone could afford to pay his share.

Some day, sooner or later, the work had got to be undertaken. The Royal Commission had urged that it was a bad time to spend money, and that was perfectly true; but when the time did come, he thought the recommendations of the Royal Commission were perfectly fair and equitable in most ways.

Mr. J. E. Bidwell (Vice-President) said after the very full and careful exposition of the Report of the Royal Commission which Mr. Fisher had given, and for which he was sure The Institution was greatly indebted, there was not very much left for him to say. The Institution was indebted to the proposer not only for the trouble he had taken in preparing the information he had just given, but for the evidence he gave before the Commission.

There were one or two points in connection with the Report on which he wished to lay special stress. All the members of The Institution would recognise the importance of drainage, and more particularly of arterial drainage with which the Report especially dealt. It was no good dealing with subsoil drainage until arterial drainage had been dealt with, and it was to arterial drainage that the Report of the Commission was directed.

Personally he thought the most important point in the Report of the Commission and the one in regard to which they were most to be congratulated on coming to a definite conclusion was the definite recognition of the principle that the whole of a catchment area should contribute towards the cost of arterial drainage.

In the first place the Commission proposed the division of the whole of England and Wales into catchment areas, and took those as the units of drainage. That was a very important advance. Speaking as one who came from the Ouse district, he thought the arrangements there, although they had misfired somewhat, were on the right lines. In the Ouse district people were accustomed to drainage boards, or drainage levels as they were called, and had been accustomed to them almost ever since the Fens were reclaimed. The Commission now recommended that the principle of taking in the whole catchment area should be adopted, and so important did he consider paragraphs 42 and 43 of their Report that he would like to read them. They were as follows:—

> "42. To put it shortly, rivers under modern conditions of roofing, paving, road-making, water supply, sanitation and agricultural under-drainage are called upon to discharge functions for which they were not designed by nature.

> 43. For these reasons we are of opinion that the 'area of benefit' should be extended, and we recommend that the extension should comprise the whole of the hereditaments in the catchment area of the river."

That was a very important advance indeed. Hitherto, he thought he was right in saying, until the Ouse Drainage Act was passed, the criterion was direct benefit, and unless a person received direct benefit he could not be made to pay towards the cost of drainage. The Report accepted the principle that the whole of the hereditaments—of course in proportionate amounts—should be made to pay in a catchment area, and the Commission divided the whole of England and Wales into catchment areas. If that principle was once accepted and became the law of the land, one might see effective arterial drainage introduced; personally he thought there was no other way.

Perhaps the next most important point was the recognition of the principle of rating on annual value instead of on acreage basis. The old drainage levels of the Fens levied their rates on an acreage basis, and had done so from time immemorial. Speaking generally, at any rate, the charge had been on an acreage basis. That had been one of the main difficulties in the Ouse district, because it operated so unfairly. One might have land which was worth for rent very little more than 5*s.* an acre, and it would pay on the same acreage basis as land which was worth 45*s.* or 50*s.*, as it very often was in the Fens. That was an obvious anomaly, and created a great prejudice against the Ouse Drainage Act.

He thought if the principle of annual value were accepted, it would go a long way towards negativing the natural opposition of the uplanders to pay towards the cost of the drainage, which they said did not affect them. The Commission had recognised the liability of the uplanders to pay, as well as the lowlanders.

The Commission perhaps rather begged the very difficult question of how the liability between the uplander and the lowlander was to be apportioned. They said there was no hard-and-fast rule, but each case must be decided on its merits and that when the catchment area authority was formed, if any objection was taken to the principle applied and the amount levied on the uplander as compared with the lowlander there could be an appeal to the Ministry on the point. The apportionment of the liability was a very difficult and thorny question, but personally he thought that if the whole catchment area was brought in, and the expense of drainage was so widely spread, there would not be the same objection as there was in the Ouse district.

Another point to which the Commission referred was the question of the principle on which the lowlands were to be divided from uplands. Originally in the Ouse Drainage Act, which he cited because it was in force and had dealt with the subject on more or less the same lines as those suggested by the Commission for the whole of England, the line of demarkation was fixed at 8 feet above the highest known flood level. If that figure was not absolutely accurate, at any rate it was fixed on those lines. The Commission which reported on the Ouse drainage adopted the principle of so many feet above Ordnance datum. Personally he thought that either of those two principles was a rule-of-thumb method and might not always apply quite fairly, but the principle of so many feet above Ordnance datum seemed a more equitable arrangement than fixing a certain number of feet above the highest known flood level, because it was not open to argument as to its operation, whereas the other method was.

Another important recommendation of the Commission was that the drainage rates should be a precept from the internal drainage authority and should have the legal authority of what were known in the ordinary way as rates; i.e., the drainage rates should be collected in the same way as the rates for the county and the county borough, and would have behind them all the legal force of the ordinary rates.

Mr. Fisher raised a point in connection with the exemption of agricultural land from rating, but he thought that could hardly apply to drainage rates. The total exemption under the present Budget was for all agricultural land, but it would hardly be arguable that agricultural land should be freed entirely from the drainage rate, which was a matter which specially affected agricultural lands.

Passing over one or two less important points, he wished to call attention to paragraph 97 of the Report, which prevented the relief of individual landowners at the expense of the district. If the Report were carried out and the drainage authorities constituted for the different districts, it would fall on them to undertake the necessary work for those districts. In certain cases, however, there were obligations attaching to the ownership of certain land, and quite rightly it was not intended to relieve the owner of any obligations in that respect. Paragraph 101 gave two years for the authority to arrive at a fair settlement by commutation for any liabilities previously existing in connection with drainage.

Another important recommendation was contained in paragraph 102, which dealt with the question of obstructions. There were many cases, at any rate in his own district, of grist mills working with a water-wheel—obsolete things which did no good to themselves or to anyone else, and which blocked the proper flow of the water in the district. He would like to see power given to some authority—and it should be, no doubt, the drainage authority—to remove those obstructions, not, of course, without some reasonable compensation for such removal. In most cases they served no useful purpose in the district, and they prevented the proper flow of water.

Paragraph 109 provided for commuting the liability for bridges, and so on. He need not go in detail into that, but the Commission had very carefully considered the matter, and were not proposing to relieve all private owners and other interests who were at present liable from their proper liability.

Paragraph 133 was a suggestion that plans of all subsoil drainage should be kept at the local county council offices. That was a very valuable suggestion. Those who lived in districts which had to be subsoil drained knew how important that subsoil drainage was, and also knew, he was sorry to say, how frequently drainage which was done in one decade was forgotten in the next. Drainage was properly carried out under a proper system, but no record was kept, and in a very short time the way in which it operated was forgotten, and one could not find out by going on the ground.

Another very important recommendation was contained in paragraph 142, to which Mr. Fisher had called attention. It concerned the question of State liability. With regard to the Ouse drainage, the Commissioners appointed recommended a definite contribution from the State towards the very considerable cost required in the Ouse district. The recommendation of the Royal Commission was contained in paragraph 142, which he wished to read:—

> "The arguments in favour of national expenditure upon land drainage are particularly strong as regards the effective clearance of detritus and sea-borne silt at the mouths of the estuaries and larger rivers, and the preservation of sea-walls and embankments against the excessive and violent encroachments of tidal water. Even more cogent is the claim for such expenditure where the deepening, widening or stabilising of the outfalls of main rivers is involved, particularly those flowing into sandy estuaries. We are, therefore, strongly of the opinion that until the State is prepared to accept due financial obligations with regard to such works as those above indicated very little progress can be made, even under the scheme which we have adumbrated, towards the realisation of the idea of an 'efficient 'system of arterial drainage.'"

If help was not obtained from the State for the main tidal rivers, the financial burden was too great for any drainage authority to carry. That section of the Report was a little vague, and he was not clear whether the wording was intended to cover the future maintenance of all sea-walls, or whether it was the preservation of sea-walls and embankments against excessive and violent encroachments—whether it had regard to extraordinary expenditure or whether it was to relieve the adjoining lands from maintenance of sea-walls in the future. Sir George Courthope, who was a member of the Commission, would be able to give enlightenment on that point.

In the previous section of the Report the Royal Commission touched on the economic position of Government assistance. The times were difficult, and perhaps it would be necessary to fight for State help. To his mind the outstanding feature of the Report, and one which he hoped The Institution would do all in its power to support, was the recognition of the principle that every hereditament within a catchment area as constituted was liable in its proportion. The question of the division of the liability was a very difficult one, but after all it was a difficulty which could be surmounted.

Colonel Sir GEORGE COURTHOPE, Bt., M.C., M.P. (Associate of Council), said he was grateful for the opportunity of saying a word on the very interesting but difficult subject under discussion. As one of the members of the Royal Commission which drew up the Report, he wished to say how valuable was the evidence given on behalf of The Surveyors' Institution by Mr. Fisher and Mr. Bidwell, both of whom had expressed their views that evening. He was particularly interested to see present that evening Mr. Dobson and Captain Roseveare, of the Ministry of Agriculture. He was sure neither Mr. Fisher nor Mr. Bidwell would think he was in the least depreciating the value of their evidence if he said that the help which Mr. Dobson and Captain Roseveare gave to the Royal Commission was beyond all praise.

He thought it was no exaggeration to say that the Commissioners were appalled and surprised by the magnitude and the urgency of the drainage problem. He had brought with him two maps, the first of which showed in black the areas of land in England and Wales which were in need of arterial drainage—in urgent need of it—and the second in black the land which was in danger of inundation from the sea. In addition to those two urgent problems, which did not permit of neglect or delay, there were nearly 4½ million acres of agricultural land—one-seventh of the area under cultivation—which depended for their fertility on the maintenance of arterial drainage; and arterial drainage was in a hopeless mess at the present time. A great deal of that land was under no drainage authority at all. In the past it got what benefit of drainage it received from the operation of great landowners; but in many cases their estates had been broken up, and A, B, C and D owned little individual farms as part of an area which was probably maintained by some great landlord in the past. A and B might be very anxious to keep their channels clear, but C and D might do nothing, and by doing nothing might not only damage their own land but make absolutely abortive and useless anything A and B might wish to do. The same thing applied to local drainage authorities, commissioners of sewers, and so on. There were 360 of those bodies in this country, and they operated under an extraordinary medley of different powers, different rules, and different laws. In many cases they were energetic and efficient bodies doing excellent work, the result of which was perhaps very largely spoilt by the fact that immediately below them there was some other body working on entirely different lines, or possibly no drainage authority at all.

There was another form of the problem, particularly near the sea in regard to coast defence. In the past the owners of land immediately adjoining the sea-wall or sea-bank used to contribute what in days gone by was a reasonable and tolerable burden towards the maintenance of the wall which protected them all from the sea. The works got rather behindhand during the war, and since the war the cost of labour and materials was so much greater than before that a number of cases had arisen where the cost of the work necessary to keep the sea out from the land, even in cases like Romney Marshes and Pett Level, where the land was of great value for the breeding of stock, was, if borne entirely by those who under the present law could alone be called on to contribute, going to cost more than the capital value of their land when saved, and therefore it would not be done. At present a certain number of essential works was being assisted by Government grants, and thus work, which would otherwise be economically impossible, was being carried out. He mentioned those examples only to show how impossible it was for the arterial drainage of the country, which was necessary to maintain the fertility of a great area, to be maintained unless there was some change in the existing law.

Mr. Fisher had made it clear that one of the difficulties of the existing law was the old conventional interpretation which had always been placed on the word "benefit." It had usually been interpreted to mean that the responsibility of any individual or any particular area for the water which they wished to get rid of finished when they had got that water beyond their own doorstep, so to speak, and that they could leave it to the people next door, on whom they dumped their surplus water, to deal with it as best they could. That, in these modern days, was an intolerable proposition. There were, in many upland areas, great centres of population doing two things which very much exaggerated or altered the normal course of nature as far as flow of water was concerned. In the first place they water-proofed great areas of soil in the towns by means of roofs, streets, and so on. Modern systems of sewage disposal and of urban drainage caused a good rainfall, instead of percolating slowly through the soil, to leave the area with a rush. There were vast areas of upland as well lowland drained by field drainage. The effect of the field drainage was to get rid of heavy rainfall with much greater rapidity, and to put a far larger volume into the channels below than nature intended those channels to bear.

In an extraordinarily large number of cases to-day—some small, but some very large—there were communities drawing vast supplies of water from another catchment area altogether, taking it out of the channel provided by nature to carry it, using it for urban or village water supply and dumping it into another river altogether. There could be no injustice, in his opinion, in asking those areas, whether upland or lowland, which passed on their surplus water, whether it was water that fell on their own areas in the form of rain or water they imported by means of water-supply schemes, to take some responsibility for the channels outside their areas which had to carry away the surplus water which they turned out from their areas. That was, he thought, the most important point in the recommendations of the Royal Commission—that so far as main channels were concerned, everyone who put water into those channels should bear some share of the responsibility for keeping those channels in a fit state to carry that water away to the sea without hurting anyone else.

Mr. Bidwell had said that in paragraph 142 of the Report the Royal Commission had not been very definite. Mr. Bidwell might have made the same comment on many other paragraphs in the Report. The Commission found it quite impossible to be very definite in many cases, because the conditions varied so enormously. They had tried to lay down in their Report recommendations on general lines, taking a big view, which could be readily applied to the different circumstances of local cases. For instance, to take the case of sea-walls, in some cases sea-walls ran far inland up a river; in other cases the natural flow of the sea was stopped at a very early stage, and after that there was only fresh water to deal with. One could not lay down a definite rule that the responsibility of the State ran wherever the salt water went and nowhere else. He thought that would lead to injustice in many cases. In cases where there was great complication, and particularly where the channels were choked by sandbanks and silt in estuaries, the Commission did say that the State must be prepared to take a hand in rendering a scheme economically possible.

There was one point to which he wished to refer in conclusion, namely, the question of annual value rather than area as the basis of rating. He wished to deal with it because he was very pleased to see Mr. Eve present, and he knew that Mr. Eve disagreed—and quite rightly had not hesitated to say so—with that particular recommendation of the Commission. First of all he wished to draw Mr. Eve's attention to the fact that there was an extraordinary variety of interests represented amongst the Commissioners. Interests and views of all kinds were represented. There were landowners, there were agents, there was the clerk of a great county council, there was the clerk of a great municipality, there was a King's counsel, there was the secretary of some very big drainage commissioners, a former Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury, a former Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture in the days of the Labour Government, and so on. One could not have a greater mix up of prejudices and interests on any body, and the fact that the Commissioners presented a unanimous Report must convince Mr. Eve, and everyone else, that in their view the evidence presented before them was absolutely overwhelming in one direction and in the particular case to he was referring in the direction of annual value rather than area as the basis of financial responsibility.

It was true that if one was considering only rainfall, area would be the right basis; but it was not natural rainfall on natural soil that was the problem, it was the water that came out of a given area and the damage done by that water, and the volume and rapidity with which it flowed out of an area depended not only on the acreage of that area, but on the works which had been done in the past on that area—the water supply, the streets, the sewers, roofing, and so on. The very matters which had created annual value and built up annual value had multiplied the difficulty of the drainage problem and the damage which water from that area did to the districts below. He could elaborate that to any extent, but briefly that was the justification in the eyes of the Commissioners for recommending an annual value, rather than acreage for the basis of rating.

To take an extreme case, he would like to take as an example an industrial city in the midlands, covering a relatively small area from a rainfall point of view, but importing from some Welsh valley a volume of water scores of times greater than its natural rainfall and discharging that water with great rapidity through artificial channels into some miserable stream which was never intended to bear one-twentieth of the volume which was put on it by the town in question. It was the building of the town, the creation of the annual value which had created the problem, and, roughly speaking, the creation of that annual value was the measure of the responsibility which, in the view of the Commission, that city or town should bear.

There was one other point to which he ought to refer. Mr. Fisher had mentioned the case of Brighton. If the whole of Brighton drained into the sea it was not draining into the main channel of any catchment area, and therefore the point of its liability did not arise. If Brighton was discharging its water into the channel of a river which flowed to the sea through another catchment area it would come within the definition, and he was not sufficiently familiar with all the contours of Brighton to express a personal opinion as to whether it did that or not. If what he expected was the case, and as Mr. Fisher stated, the whole of Brighton discharged its water direct into the sea, it did not come within the proposals of the Commission with regard to responsibility for water discharged from an upland or urban area into a channel flowing through other areas to the sea, so that he did not think the question arose in that particular case.

He was very pleased, indeed, a great Institution like The Surveyors' Institution should take so much interest in the question as to devote an evening to the consideration of the Report, and he hoped that all the members would use their great influence to see that the Report was not pigeon-holed, and that something was done before the problem got even more serious than it was at the present time.

Mr. E. M. KONSTAM, K.C. (Associate), said that he had read the Report of the Royal Commission with considerable relief, a feeling which was strengthened by the speeches that evening. For the last eight years he had refused to recant doctrines of the truth of which he was convinced and for holding which he had been, metaphorically, sentenced to the fires of martyrdom. Nowadays more or less parliamentary language was used; but the obloquy which had been hurled at that inane, inept, futile document, the Ouse Drainage Act of 1920, was of great interest to the draftsmen of that document. Everything he had heard that evening, however, had convinced him there was really nothing to be said in principle against that Act. It might be quite wrong in detail; there might be hundreds of mistakes; but in principle it was in accordance with the doctrines laid down by the Royal Commission and which Sir George Courthope and others who had taken part in the discussion regarded as vital.

Sir George Courthope had said that the Commissioners were amazed and appalled at the urgency and the magnitude of the problem. Ten years ago circumstances brought him face to face with that problem when he was serving in the Ministry of Agriculture, and he too was amazed at its magnitude. What happened at that time was that from every Agricultural Executive Committee of every county save Northumberland (where the rivers ran rapidly to the sea on short courses) representations were made as to the urgency of dealing with the question of land drainage, and the urgency in particular of having prisoners of war to carry out that land drainage for nothing. It became evident that something had to be attemped to put that land drainage on a permanent basis, and Mr. Clayton, whom he was glad to see present that evening—the things Mr. Clayton did not know about land drainage were not knowledge—pointed out "the necessity of having a supreme authority in "each catchment area in charge of the main channel and "banks of the river, and working in the closest collaboration "with the drainage authorities concerned with the internal "drainage of the catchment area." The words were not those which Mr. Clayton used in 1917, but were to be found in paragraph 58 of the Report of the Royal Commission; the substance was the same.

That was what it was attempted to do in the case of the Ouse. Success was obtained to the extent that the whole of that river system was brought under the control of a single drainage authority. It was true power was not obtained to do all that the Royal Commission now suggested (and they themselves had to recommend that the law be changed to bring it about) in the way of seeing that everyone in the watershed was rated. If, however, anyone thought the Ministry of Agriculture ought to have waited to bring the whole of the Ouse under control of a single body until the law was altered, one could only refer him to the appendix to the Report of the Royal Commission, where it was stated that alterations in the law was suggested by a strong Committee of the House of Lords in 1877, and remind him that we were now in the year 1928, and that those alterations had not yet been made.

Another thing which was attempted was this: As Sir George Courthope had said, it was an intolerable proposition that those who sent down the water from above should not have some responsibility for the cost of discharging that water, and that was why there was inserted in the Ouse Drainage Act of 1920 a schedule of proportionate rates which were to be levied on uplanders—uplanders not in the widest sense of the term, but uplanders so far as it was possible to get at them under the law as it then stood. That was heresy at the time, and was described in the terms he had mentioned, but it was now orthodoxy.

It was not altogether accurate to say that under the law as it stood at present it was only direct benefit which could be looked to. It was decided about 1834, in a case which went by the euphonious name of Soady v. Wilson, that Soady, of the Audit Office in Somerset House was rateable for Somerset House for sewer rates because the operations of the Commissioners of Sewers benefited the access, i.e., prevented the roads which gave access to Somerset House from being flooded. It was not altogether accurate to say, therefore, that the benefit must relate to the land itself; it might be to the access to the land or in other ways. It might be an indirect benefit to the land, and not necessarily the preservation of the land from waterlogging.

As the law stood, however, there was no doubt that the area of taxation was extraordinarily limited, and he felt convinced it was impossible to find any logical dividing line short of the watershed itself; and he was glad that view was shared by the Royal Commission and by those who had spoken that evening.

There must arise a very serious question which Sir George Courthope would forgive him for saying the Royal Commission had not gone very far towards solving, namely, the apportionment of the cost in the watershed area between the various portions of that area.

That, no doubt, involved the question of acreage or annual value, but, as Mr. Fisher pointed out, new factors had been brought into that problem by the Budget. On the one hand agricultural land was to be freed from rates. The farmer would not therefore have to go on contributing, as it had been his grievance to have to contribute in the past, to things which did not benefit his agricultural land. He would not have to contribute to education, to the high roads which he did not happen to use, or to lighting and things of that kind. It was, therefore, not too much to hope that the farmer would now be more willing to contribute to the one public improvement which was likely to benefit his land more than anything else, namely, drainage. Sir George Courthope had given figures which were extremely striking, and he need not magnify them.

Last September going up to Peterborough after the heavy rains he saw several miles of the Ouse Valley under stagnant water which must have been there for a fortnight or three weeks. He noticed that in 1877 it was the opinion of several witnesses of experience that floods of moderate duration were not always prejudicial to the land—and that was repeated during the Parliamentary Committees on the Ouse Bill—but where from insufficient arterial drainage or other causes the flood waters remained stagnant on the soil injuries arose in consequence. That was what was happening in the Upper Ouse Valley last September, and it must have been happening in many other parts of England. It was not only the flooding that caused trouble; it was the subsoil waterlogging that was deleterious to cultivation, and possibly the latter was even worse than the former.

There was a real benefit to be obtained for agriculture by proper arterial drainage, and that must surely be worth paying for by those who benefited. He did not know whether it would be possible to get money from the State for it also, although he hoped it might be. Now that subventions were in the air it might be possible to get money from the State, and it was clear, as the Royal Commission said, there were a great many works which could not be economically carried out unless the State came in to help.

There was another side to the question which seemed to him rather serious from the administrative point of view. If one took the annual valve, one was not going to have any record of annual value for agricultural land in future, and one would have annual value for urban land and the farmhouses and so on in the rural areas, but not for the agricultural land itself. There might be great difficulty if there was to be put upon the drainage authorities the obligation of making a valuation where none existed for agricultural land, while one had the valuations ready to one's hand for the urban areas and farmhouses and a few residential houses in the rural areas. He was not venturing to suggest what should be done, but it seemed to him the whole problem of the rating for drainage would now have to be considered from a new point of view. It was too early for anyone to have thought out carefully what the results would be, and they would have to be thought out again. The proposal which seemed so convenient and expedient in the Report of the Royal Commission as to the collection of rates being made on one demand note must now fall to the ground, because although there might be only one demand note for urban areas, there could not be one demand note for agricultural land, or, rather, there might be one demand note, but it would have on it only the drainage rate, because there would be no other rate to demand except for farmhouses. There was no advantage in having a rate for a farmhouse and a rate for a large extent of farm land on one demand note when they were rates on different things. That, again, was an element in the problem which would have to be studied, for new circumstances had come about. It was very urgent that something should be done, and that the matter of finance should be thought out. It was almost equally urgent that the whole law, as the Commission recommended, should be codified and put on a firm basis, and that the powers of drainage boards and authorities should be made perfectly clear.

Only the previous day he was dealing with a case of a commission of sewers which had been established for 300 or 400 years, the territorial jurisdiction of which was bounded in their Commission by a boundary on one side only, so that no human being could possibly say how far up the tributary rivers of the main river their jurisdiction extended. That could not be right; it was not sensible. As a matter of fact the Commissioners had exercised jurisdiction by creating districts under one of several sections under which they could do so, and they had exercised jurisdiction up to certain points on the various tributary rivers; but why they should stop at those points and not go to the top no man could say. There was no law to tell them. Things of that kind ought not to go on in a civilised country in the year 1928, yet he could multiply instances.

He wanted, before concluding, to express his sincere agreement with Mr. Bidwell in drawing attention to two points, one of which was with regard to commutation. One was always getting cases of great difficulty with regard to the liabilities of individual owners, which applied mostly to sea-walls, but also in some cases to rivers. As was well-known, drainage authorities must not levy a rate if there was a liability on an individual owner, and therefore they had to find out first whether anyone was liable by reason of his holding to do particular work before they could levy a rate. If they levied a rate and then it was found out that some particular person ought to have been made liable to do the work the rate was bad, and consequently it was extremely important that, as the Royal Commission suggested, the authorities should be directed to buy out all liabilities within a limited period of time.

The other matter was with regard to mills. He had no doubt that many of the smaller rivers in England were very seriously blocked by mills. On the other hand, as Mr. Bidwell said, the mills were often of very little use, but it must be remembered that in many cases they were capable of being turned to use for supplying electrical power. He noticed the Commission had not dealt with the question of electrical power. The Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on Water Power Resources dealt with this matter, and there could be no doubt that with the improvement of the turbine since that Committee reported small rivers might be of importance in connection with the supply of electrical power, not, of course, of vast economic importance, but of substantial importance to the comfort and profit of the rural population. He ventured to suggest that in dealing with the question of obstruction, the drainage boards ought to be given some powers which would enable them to compensate owners of old mills, and at the same time to make arrangements by which they might be used for generating electric power while conforming to conditions which would cause the minimum of obstruction to drainage. He thought that was a matter which should be thought of, because one did not want to waste the rivers either as channels for carrying away drainage from agricultural land or as potential sources of electrical power for the rural population.

Anyone who went to France and travelled through any portion of that country would be struck by the beautifully clear rivers without any weeds or obstructions in them. On coming back to this country and seeing the state that our rivers were in, one must blush for one's country in comparison with France. He hoped the Report of the Royal Commission, and the views which had been expressed that evening, would help towards moving that reproach from the face of our beloved country.

Mr. T. WARD WHITFIELD (Fellow) said the magnitude of the task which confronted the Royal Commission and the value of the Report could be appreciated only when they considered the circumstances in which the Royal Warrant was issued. Owing to the obstructed condition of the rivers and streams, efficient drainage had become impossible in many parts of the country. Extensive areas including most fertile agricultural land had become waterlogged; floods had increased in frequency, extent, and duration. The resulting loss to the community was colossal; indeed, the Royal Command was in the nature of an S.O.S.

Those chaotic conditions were not due to the absence of legislation but to numerous piecemeal statutes, both general and local, which had been superimposed one upon another for four centuries; being often at variance with common law custom, and equity, they made little provision for co-operation or continuity. By narrow interpretations as to benefit, and deliberate obstructions, the Bill of Sewers 1531 had been reduced to little more than an interesting relic, yet in the absence of any consolidating measure that Act remained the basis of legislation. There could be no two opinions with regard to the recommendation of the Royal Commission, that the general drainage law should be consolidated and amended.

The difficulties of the Commission had been considerably increased by recent legislation. It could at least be said that the Act of Henry VIII. appreciated the maintenance of arterial drainage as a duty of the State necessary for the preservation of the realm, a fact ignored by the Land Drainage Act of 1861, and unfortunately the defect was maintained in the Land Drainage Acts of 1918 and 1926. Those Acts were expressly confined to the drainage of land for agricultural purposes, whereas the preceding statutes were referred to as Bills of Sewers, a title which in itself suggested a public health interest.

In December, 1926, he had the honour to read to The Institution a Paper on "Land Drainage." In the course of the discussion they were informed that the Government had a few days before given notice of its intention to introduce drainage legislation on the lines of the Ouse Commission Report. When replying to the discussion he expressed the opinion that if the conditions and requirements within the basin of the Ouse were so different to those prevailing in the rest of the country, then the Report of the Ouse Commission would be unsuitable as a basis for general legislation. Having regard to the fact that the terms of reference were confined to the Ouse, he suggested that a further Commission should be appointed to continue investigations in other areas, unless the Government were satisfied that the recommendations of the Ouse Commission were applicable to and likely to meet the requirements of the rest of the country. The following March a statement appeared in the press that the Government had abandoned their announced intention of legislating last year and had appointed a Royal Commission to enquire into the whole problem.

Notwithstanding the fact that the terms of reference to the Royal Commission extended to the whole of England and Wales, the Government proceeded with the Ouse Drainage Bill, even while the Royal Commission were conducting their investigations. Such procedure must have increased the difficulties, the text of the Bill being known would tend to prejudice unbiased investigation of the larger problem. Parliament rejected the Bill, but had it become law before the findings of the Royal Commission were available it would have created a precedent which the Exchequer might have found impossible to extend to other areas, for under the provisions of the Ouse Bill the State was to contribute 1¼ million; this, notwithstanding the fact that the tenure of land within the basin of the Ouse is identical with the rest of the country where improved arterial drainage might be equally necessary but impossible under existing conditions.

He fully appreciated the impossible position of landowners and farmers within the Ouse and other drainage districts which owed their existence to the Drainage Act of 1861. It could not, however, be denied that the Ouse Bill presented to Parliament last summer was only necessary to amend the Ouse Order of 1920, which failed because the Land Drainage Act of 1918 did nothing to remove the injustice to agriculture which appears to have been established by the Land Drainage Act of 1861.

There appeared to have been little continuity in recent legislation.

The Land Drainage Act of 1918 accepted the principle that the provision of a proper system of drainage administration was a responsibility of the State, leaving the executive duties in the hands of the local authorities.

Under the provisions of that Act many county councils set up the necessary administrative machinery, the State bearing the entire cost of administration, and subsequently under the unemployment schemes the State contributed two-thirds of the cost of the work including administration.

By the Land Drainage Act of 1926 the Government transferred from the imperial to the local exchequer the whole of the responsibility it had accepted under the 1918 Act. During the debate on the Bill the Minister was warned that the effect of such transfer would be to render even maintenance of work impossible in counties with low rateable value. It must, however, be admitted that the administration of the 1926 Act would have been a direct cause of waterlogging and flooding, for while it provided for the improvement of tributory streams it made no provision for the removal of obstructions and maintenance of the river into which such tributaries discharge, nor did it define a sewer.

The Report of the Royal Commission recorded the fact that the Middlesex County Council found it necessary to promote special legislation for the maintenance of arterial drainage, and referred to the fact that as the drainage authority the council executed works which were mainly in the interest of public health. The Report also showed that the County Councils of Lancashire, West Riding of Yorkshire and Surrey had been obliged to promote special legislation. It would be observed that these counties were wealthy areas, where the cost of promoting and administering such Acts did not entail the same financial hardship as would be the case in counties with a low rateable value.

He had been unable to find any reference in the Report of the Royal Commission to the provisions contained in Part V. of the Public Health Act of 1925, under which, by consent of the Ministry of Health, urban and rural authorities might improve the arterial drainage of the district and bear the whole cost of the work provided it did not extend to rivers used for navigation.

As land drainage and flood prevention works were generally identical and inseparable, it could not be conducive to efficiency or economy for public health, agricultural and numerous other interests forming but part of one stupendous whole to be isolated and dealt with separately.

Only a few weeks ago he had to advise four local authorities as to ways and means by which the Northern Wiltshire Avon could be systematically improved. There being no provision for such work under the Land Drainage Act, 1926, it was decided to consider the possibilities of proceeding under the Public Health Act, 1925. This showed that even in an agricultural county, drainage interests of public health and agriculture were inseparable and should be co-ordinated.

The provisions relating to arterial drainage contained in the Public Health Act, 1925, the legislation promoted by several county councils, the recent Ouse Bill and a mass of other local drainage Acts had only become necessary in the absence of a national comprehensive policy, but their existence must have increased the difficulties of the Royal Commission.

Having regard to the numerous interests which derived benefit and to the fact that the extent of the catchment area had a direct influence on arterial drainage requirements, the recommendation of the Royal Commission to distribute the burden to all hereditaments within the catchment area appeared justified, as also the recommendation that drainage rates should be based on annual value and not acreage. Doubtless much controversy would arise in determining the boundary between the uplands and the lowlands and as to the basis upon which urban areas should contribute. Whilst a flat rate would have simplified procedure, it could not be justified having regard to the difference in value of service as between direct and indirect benefit.

The greater part of the Royal Commission Report had reference to administration. Whilst it would be impracticable to prescribe any general scheme of conservancy applicable to all rivers, having regard to varied conditions and requirements, yet in matters of general policy uniformity appeared essential. Dual and overlapping control should be avoided both in the central Government departments and through the local units of administration. There should be sufficient elasticity to meet the varied requirements of the country.

By reference to map, Appendix No. V., which showed approximately 180 catchment areas superimposed upon the 62 county councils, it was clear that in some instances it would be necessary to extend the area of the administrative body to more than one county. On the other hand, beyond some 10 or 12 large catchment areas in the centre of the country, there remained some 160 smaller catchment areas where drainage problems might arise. The Royal Commission appreciated that the cost of creating and maintaining such small administrative authorities could not be justified, and recommended, where an area was small, that it should be grouped with a neighbouring area. Consideration would show that this would often prove impracticable, for while requirements might be acute in one area, they might in adjoining areas be small or such as only to require periodical attention.

Having regard to the recommendations of the Royal Commission that the county councils and county boroughs should take the initiative in the creation of the catchment area authorities and to provide funds required for their maintenance, it would seem that the county council should, in the first instance, be constituted the controlling and supervising authority, for it was directly concerned with rating, public health, roads and bridges, small holdings, and was the only local authority dealing with agriculture. These several interests were directly affected by drainage, and needed co-ordination and consolidation under one direction. Where the requirements of an area rendered joint action necessary, the councils concerned should set up and work through a joint committee acting as a catchment area authority, to whom they should delegate their administrative powers for that area.

It seems ridiculous to suggest that county and borough councils, recognised administrative units for local government, elected on the broadest and most authoritative basis and directly responsible to the ratepayers, would be incapable of taking joint action where necessary. In the past, unaided by legislation, such arrangements had been made between Gloucester, Hampshire, Dorset, and Wilts, where necessary for common drainage problems.

Again, was it not the county councils concerned that first appreciated the necessity for co-operative action in the basin of the Ouse, and petitioned the Ministry to set up a joint authority?

In evidence submitted to the Royal Commission he referred to the fact that with the county council as the unit of administration the services of existing officials would be available, more particularly in the legal and finance departments, and that possibly where drainage requirements were small no special staff would be necessary. When examined with reference to this statement it was suggested to him as conceivable that "if there was much drainage work to be "done, even those officials, or even the office accommodation, "might have to be augmented." From this he concluded the Royal Commission had in mind requirements of areas where drainage problems were most acute, such as north Somerset, the Doncaster area, or the Fens, and that it was unfortunate that they had not invited direct evidence from such County Councils as Warwick, Gloucester, and Wilts, where a considerable volume of work had been accomplished under voluntary co-operative schemes, most of which only required periodical maintenance.

The Under-Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, in evidence before the Royal Commission, urged as important that whatever the Commission recommended should be compulsory and not permissive so far as it related to the setting up of a Board for the catchment area; that if the Commission erred, it was to be hoped they would err on the side of being superdrastic. In this connection it must be remembered that drastic action often gave rise to reaction, and that compulsion always created resentment and opposition which could often be overcome by practical demonstration and education. Whilst drastic action might be necessary, compulsion could never be justified until it had the support of the majority of those for whose benefit it was to be exercised.

It was not quite clear what procedure was to be followed prior to the creation of these special catchment area authorities, but it seemed desirable that full publicity should be given and a public enquiry conducted in each case before any new authority was constituted.

It was a significant fact that the Royal Commission made several references to the findings of the Select Committee of the House of Lords, 1877, and considered it desirable to reproduce this report as an appendix. How different conditions would be to-day if those recommendations had been followed half a century ago, or even incorporated as the basis of legislation in 1918! The loss sustained to the country as a result of that report being pigeon-holed might never be estimated, but the Government should at least profit by experience and give effect to the findings of the Royal Commission with the same promptitude as the Commission gave to the matter. This might not be possible having regard to the far-reaching proposals foreshadowed in the recent Budget and the need for consideration of local Government reform as a whole.

In any event a considerable period must elapse before the catchment area authorities indicated by the Ministry of Agriculture as necessary as priority cases could be established. In the interim the Government might consider the desirability of constituting each county council the drainage authority for its area, and amend the Act of 1926, extending its provisions to all watercourses not already under the jurisdiction of a statutory drainage authority; the provisions of the Act only to be enforced when the majority of those concerned were in agreement, without making any change in the incidence of rating until such time as Parliament was able to give effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission.

Mr. C. GERALD EVE (Member of Council) said that whatever his views might be on the question of whether a drainage rate should be paid on annual value or rateable value, he realised the point was a side issue, and the much more important question which had been decided by the Royal Commission was that the whole catchment area ought to pay towards drainage rates, and not only the people who from time to time were flooded. That was the main point, and he was sure it would be a very fine thing for the country if effect was given to that recommendation.

Touching for a moment on the question of whether one should rate for drainage purposes on annual value or acreage, with great obstinacy, which he hoped was not usual in his case, he still had to confess that he was not converted. The learned counsel who once examined him on that very subject, and who was entirely against him, said to him after the examination "Almost hast thou "persuaded me to be a Christian." That was the best success he had obtained in the question so far. After all, if one was going on annual value—and not necessarily, with great respect to Mr. Konstam, on rateable value, because annual value for Schedule A was available—one was going to perpetrate an enormous change. Taking, for example, the 430,000 acres of the Fen district, they had always paid on an acreage basis, and they wished to continue to pay on an acreage basis. Not only that, but they even paid without having the money collected from them. They paid by half-yearly advertisements in the local press, which asked them to go to a certain public-house and pay on a certain date. That was what the Fens did on an acreage basis. He ventured to say they would certainly not do that if they got a demand note on annual value.

The point he wished especially to emphasise was that the real rateable value, quite apart from the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would disappear from the rate-book, if the unpopular drainage rate was attracted to it, for over one-twelfth of the Fen district. In other words, the rateable value to-day of the Fens, strictly speaking, would be nil for at least one-eighth of the area if it were scientifically and properly ascertained. If one took away the prior charges such as tithe and drainage rates as in law one should before ariving at rateable value, whole tracts of the Fens would have to-day, quite apart from the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement, no rateable value, and those people would not be paying anything towards the common purpose of keeping the Ouse free from obstruction.

It was true there were anomalies whatever was done with regard to drainage rates, and if an acreage basis were adopted, it might be asked why a bad acre should pay as much as a good one; but if annual value were made the basis of rating, whole tracts would be found which had nothing to pay at all. There were anomalies in each case, but they were fewer with the acreage basis. Acreage basis was invented in the reign of Henry VIII. as a tax on site values to keep sites from being drowned. Having bought or rented a farm, a manunder stood he would pay a certain acreage rate, which had been the basis ever since the time of Henry VIII. Suddenly the landowner was going to be told "You "bought this estate a year or two ago, and you are paying "2*s.* 6*d.* an acre drainage rate, but now you are to be "charged on annual value." Very likely that estate had been so improved by superstructures and in other ways, and by the expenditure of the drainage rates themselves, that the annual value had been lifted up to a good price, and the man would be told "You will have to pay £50 instead of "£5." Another man who had previously had to pay £50 would be told he need only pay £5. Looking at the rateable value per acre of all the land in England, and remembering the little man's nurseries where the ground was worth £10 an acre, and the land near Sandy, for example, where it was worth £15 an acre for early potatoes for Covent Garden, if the drainage rate was worked out on annual value it would be found there would be such a violent change in the bill for drainage rate between landlord and landlord, who had bought their land on the understanding of an acreage rate, that the volte face would wreck any ship which tried to sail a drainage rate on annual value.

There were whole tracts of land in the Fens to-day whose rateable value was theoretically strictly nil, though one could go to big parishes in the Fens and, in fact, rate them at £1 an acre, and although it was not scientific the farmers did not mind. If one went about it scientifically and said that the rent was 30*s.*, and took off repairs at 2*s.*, and tithe rent-charge which was often 3*s.* 6*d.* in the Fen district, and the internal drainage rate and level rate which might be as much as 19*s.* 4*d.* an acre, and the Ouse Board rate, any land which was not worth 25*s.* an acre gross rent had a rateable value of nil if scientifically ascertained. As soon as farmers were told that the unpopular drainage rate for the Ouse Board was going to be attached to the rateable value, they would see a rateable value was arrived at in accordance with the law and not in accordance with the sporting practice of saying "What about £1 an acre?" That was his main reason for saying that the drainage rate on rateable value was not a practical proposition. The same considerations would apply to net Schedule A annual value.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to those who took part in the discussion.

From Mr. J. HINDMARSH (Visitor):—

As an official of a county council which has for some years appreciated the need for improved drainage for the benefit of agricultural interests, I trust the following comments on the subject under discussion may be acceptable.

After some years of experience of the less spectacular practice of drainage and a long acquaintance with agriculture, I hope that when all drainage law is to be amended and codified it will not have the effect of indefinitely delaying the improvements which the Commission have recognised as urgently needed in many districts. We have in the Report the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Lords in 1877, which have not yet been given effect to, but are still required.

Should the result of this Commission be that all attention is to be directed to the larger problems of the main rivers, and the small difficulties of ditch and watercourse which directly affect the cultivator of the soil be postponed until the rivers have had treatment, then the farmer will not be relieved of his pressing difficulties.

I hope my plea for the humble ditch may be received, and the powers contained in the Act of 1926 not be made contingent upon powers to deal with the main drain of a watershed when this Report is given effect to in another Drainage Act, which is forecasted.

I suggest, too, that up to the Act of 1926 the State always recognised their responsibility for the prevention of floods and the protection of land, whereas in this Act they have endeavoured to pass to the local authorities this responsibility, together with the financial burden of administration.

I think I am right in saying that in the early days of drainage, contributions were collected in the form of "Scotts," really a tax, and these were distinct from rates in as far as they were payable to the king or his appointed undertakers, or commissioners. I suggest that, if this view is right, then the responsibility of drainage is a State responsibility, and the collection of what is now "rates" for drainage purposes should be in the form of tax which might be dealt with on the Schedule A assessment.

I too would have liked to have heard views on the effect of the Public Health Act, 1926, Part V., as to what authority would be suitable for administering these arterial drainage powers.

From Mr. F. TOMLINSON (Visitor):—

Since 1866 we have had some eight Royal Commissions and Committees enquiring into the condition of our rivers and streams. Summarised, their recommendations exhibit an almost surprising unanimity, at least in one direction, viz., the necessity for alteration in the present methods of control. With such unanimous opinions, expressed from official quarters, and extending over such a long period, one is tempted to enquire why no serious general steps have yet been taken to carry into effect those recommendations.

It will be noted that all the Commissions and Committees, reporting previous to the Report now under consideration, of the Land Drainage Commission, provided very limited sources from which funds may be obtained, or, in the words of the Land Drainage Commission, "Drainage authorities "have wholly inadequate areas over which they may levy "rates for carrying out necessary drainage works." It may be that has been one of the serious stumbling-blocks in the past.

The suggested constitution of the Catchment Area Authority is open to criticism. It is to be inferred that the controlling influence on the authority will be appointed by the county councils and county boroughs, and no doubt those bodies will select largely from their own members.

Too frequently in the past competition and rivalry have dictated policy, and have resulted in unsatisfactory methods and wasteful expenditure.

The comparing of figures of the total rates levied on adjoining counties and county boroughs is a very popular pastime with public men and irritable ratepayers. If members of Catchment Area Authorities are compelled to go before meetings of angry ratepayers, as frequently as members of county councils and similar bodies, and have to give at frequent intervals an account of their actions, I am inclined to think that rates will continue to have a retarding influence on desirable works for improvement of rivers and streams.

The general attitude towards this matter can be put shortly by a simple illustration. The attention of the owner of a very desirable property in Surrey was called to the fact that his drainage was polluting the River Wey, and he was requested to take steps to prevent such pollution. His reply was that the drainage arrangements had recently been reconstructed at considerable expense by a firm of first-class London sanitary engineers, and were now satisfactory to the local sanitary authority. Why should he be compelled, therefore, to incur further expense in order to improve the water supply of London? Most disinterested persons would extend a considerable amount of sympathy to that owner. I am inclined to think a somewhat similar argument, perhaps elaborated, will be extensively used when urban populations are called upon to contribute to the cost of improvement and maintenance of our rivers and streams. Subject to keeping within the law, individuals and collections of individuals are little concerned with the troubles of those below them on a stream. The present state of our civilisation demands a policy of the greatest good to the greatest number. One, however, welcomes an almost new principle in the present Report, viz., that improvements required for the benefit of the majority must be largely paid for by the majority. If that idea is faithfully carried out, I am hopeful of a decided improvement in the conditions of our watercourses.

If any legislation is the outcome of this Report, I would urge the necessity for steps to be taken to see that the rivers authorities are specifically given powers to expend public moneys upon private property. The absence of such specific provision affords an excellent argument to that super economist who argues that, as powers are not specifically given, therefore they must be presumed not to be possessed. The condition of the River Brent is a striking practical illustration of the value of the additional powers specifically given to the Middlesex County Council over those possessed by the Thames Conservancy over the same area.

To further illustrate my point, I will take the district with which I am most familiar, viz., Northampton and the county surrounding it. The surface rocks are chiefly of the Inferior Oolite series, very easily eroded. Owing to agricultural depression, ditch and stream cleaning is very much neglected. One rarely sees, or hears of, mill-dams being cleaned out. Two years ago, however, I was responsible for the cleaning out of a mill-dam which intercepted a gathering ground of 3,000 acres only. The work was thoroughly done at a cost of £500. To-day we could excavate from that dam as much deposit as was removed two years ago. To compel an ordinary millowner to keep pace with such conditions would be ruinous. He would probably prefer to give you the mill. The usual practice is similar, no doubt, to that adopted in other parts of the country, viz., draw the sluices in flood-time, in the hope there will be sufficient scour to restore the mill-dam to a reasonable capacity. Even if this is not done, the conditions are nearly as bad, for the fact that the mill-dam is already choked with mud means that a great proportion of the suspended mattter in the flood water is passed forward to the lower-lying land, there to be deposited, tending to cause flooding, choke drainage, and retard to a large extent that periodic scour which rivers and streams invariably require if a desirable condition is to be arrived at. The stream-courses with us, on the lower-lying land, are chiefly channels, naturally formed in previously deposited mud, with a rapid tendency to change direction, rarely to form straight lines and assist rapid run off. To call upon the owners of such lands to clear out the stream-courses, and straighten the worst curves, would involve them in an expense approaching, if it did not exceed, the value of the land.

There are large areas of land suitable for improvement by warping, but in the present state of the law the legal responsibilities are such as to afford an effective bar to any attempts in this direction however desirable.

Considerable damage by flooding in and around Northampton is a regular experience; and without being able to quote figures, I venture to suggest the amount of that damage yearly exceeds the toll fees and rates received by the Nene Commissioners between Northampton and Wellingborough.

The income of the Nene Commissioners is not sufficient to allow of their expending any moneys in attempting flood control either in the direction of promoting scour or to reduce damage.

If control boards became an accomplished fact, backed with sufficient powers and funds, the work devolving upon them would afford a welcome relief to an increasingly difficult problem, viz., the providing of unemployment relief works.

Recently the Northampton Corporation expended a sum exceeding £31,000 on one such scheme, utilising the labour to clean out, straighten and widen a section of the River Nene. The usefulness of that work has been reduced owing to the sluggishness of the river below, and the absence of power to do anything in the direction of flood control with a view to promoting scour.

In any further legislation I would also advocate the necessity to provide that powers given to any control boards are elastic. The present private Acts are too binding upon the authorities responsible for their administration. The carrying out of such definite powers tends either to irritation or neglect. The authorities responsible for the carrying out of existing private Acts have no alternative but to deal with the drainage from a cottager's pig-sty in the same way they would deal with the drainage from premises housing 1,000 pigs. They must treat the sewage effluent from a hamlet of half a dozen cottages in exactly the same way they deal with the sewage effluent from a town of half a million inhabitants. The samples are sent to the analyst in similar sized bottles.

To me the inclusion of the provision of substantial funds in the Report is its most hopeful feature, and the spreading of the charges over the whole area strikes me as being the only fair way of dealing with a very difficult problem.

The Report of the Council on the affairs of The Institution and the Statement of Receipts and Expenditure for the year 1927 were read.

It was Resolved—"That the Report of the Council and the Balance Sheet be received and approved, and be printed and circulated with the Transactions."

It was Resolved—"That the thanks of The Institution be given to Messrs. C. de la Quintana and H. F. Chambers for the efficient performance of their duties as Auditors, and that they be requested to continue their services for the coming year."

It was Resolved—"That the thanks of The Institution are due and be given to the President, Vice-Presidents, and the other Members and Associates of The Council, for the able manner in which they have administered the affairs of The Institution."

It was Resolved—"That the thanks of The Institution are due and be given to Mr. A. Norman Garrard (the Honorary Secretary), to Mr. Alexander Goddard (the Secretary), and the other Officers of The Institution, for the able manner in which they have executed their several duties."

It was Resolved—"That the thanks of The Institution be given to Messrs. A. E. Baylis, C. S. Burkett-Smith, C. de la Quintana, R. J. Dibdin, J. G. Elsworthy, H. E. Gillett, H. A. Glover, A. F. Hooper, H. W. Langdon, J. Nicholson, J. A. Rosevear, K. B. Stanley, H. A. Steward and G. L. Vigers, for their services as Scrutineers."

The Chairman presented the following Prizes won by Candidates in the Preliminary and Professional Examinations, 1927:—

THE "PENFOLD" GOLD MEDAL

for the highest marks (over 75 °/₀ of the maximum) in the Final Examination, to Reginald Charles Ward Davey, who obtained 904 marks out of 1,000.

Mr. Davey was also the winner of

THE "GALSWORTHY" PRIZE,

being the Interest accruing on a Sum of £500,

awarded to the Candidate in the Final Examination who, having passed the Intermediate Examination, in the Students

Division, is found to have obtained the highest number of marks in the two Examinations combined,

AND

THE "CRAWTER" PRIZE,

BEING THE INTEREST ACCRUING ON A SUM OF £200,

for the best work in "Principles and Practice of Valuation," in which he obtained 98 °/₀ of the maximum marks.

THE "WAINWRIGHT" PRIZE,

BEING THE INTEREST ACCRUING ON A SUM OF £500,

awarded to the Candidate in the Final Examination who, having passed the Intermediate Examination in the Non-Students' Division, is found to have obtained the highest number of marks in the two Examinations combined, to DAVIS INGLIS GOTCH.

THE "PENFOLD" SILVER MEDAL

for the highest marks (over 75 °/₀ of the maximum) in the Students' and Non-Students' Divisions of the Intermediate Examination, to ARTHUR ERNEST MEAD KIDD, who obtained 875 marks out of 1,000.

Mr. KIDD was also the winner of

THE "DRIVER" PRIZE,

BEING THE INTEREST ACCRUING ON A SUM OF £500,

for the highest marks obtained by a Non-Student Candidate in the Intermediate Examination.

to ARTHUR ERNEST MEAD KIDD, GILBERT ROWBOTTOM, ERNEST OWEN SADLER, JOHN FRANCIS GEORGE SMITH, CHARLES WILLIAM STEPHENSON, who obtained full marks in this subject.

THE "INSTITUTION" PRIZE OF THE VALUE OF £15 15*s.*

awarded to the Candidate at the head of the list in the Students' Division of the Intermediate Examination, to BRYAN LEOLIN RICHARDS, who obtained 820 marks out of 1,000.

THE "BEADEL" PRIZE,

BEING THE INTEREST ACCRUING ON A SUM OF £200,

for the best work in the subject of "Agriculture," to LESLIE CHARLES HILL who obtained 98 °/₀ of the maximum marks.

to NEIL EDWARD MACKAY, the Candidate from Scotland who obtained the highest number of marks in the Intermediate Examination.

THE "PRELIMINARY" PRIZE OF THE VALUE OF £2 2*s.*

to ALFRED JOHN WILLS, who obtained 419 marks out of 500.

THE SIXTIETH
ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL.

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING,
Monday, 4th June, 1928.

While it is the primary duty of the Council to present, at the Annual General Meeting each year, a review of the matters which have claimed their attention, and of the action taken thereon, during the year immediately past, it is not unfitting, perhaps, on the eve of the Diamond Jubilee of The Institution to refer to the progress achieved during the six decades of their existence. The First Annual Report of the Council, presented in 1869, recorded the election of 162 Members, 38 Associates, and 2 Students. In May, 1928, the class of Fellows numbered 2,627; Colonial Fellows, 128; Professional Associates, 2,851; Associates, 38; Probationers, 967; and Students, 406; a total, including 31 Honorary Members, of 7,048. Of the 24,805 candidates who have entered for the Preliminary and Professional Examinations since these were first established in 1881, 16,025 have been successful.

Since the last Annual General Meeting The Institution premises, the site of which was selected in 1868 and has never changed, have been embellished by the remodelling of the Lecture Hall from designs by Mr. Sydney Tatchell, F.R.I.B.A. The Council are confident that the improvement is one which will be appreciated by members as adding to the beauty and dignity of their building; and those responsible for the management of woodland property will learn with satisfaction that English oak has been used throughout for the panelling.

The use of the designation "Chartered Surveyor," and the possible means by which it may be extended and made familiar to the public, has engaged the earnest attention of the Council during the session. The use of the designation is a practice which the Council cannot too strongly urge upon members, for it is chiefly by this means that progress will be made in the better education of the public as to the qualifications which the title implies. In this connection the value of skilled methods of publicity has not been forgotten, and invitations were issued to, and accepted by, other kindred chartered societies to confer with The Institution as to the directions in which a joint effort on behalf of their members might be made. A beginning has already been effected by the circulation of the List of Members to the more important local authorities, and this will be followed by its distribution to leading firms of solicitors, banks and insurance companies throughout the country. The designation, however, has a purely professional and personal significance, and for this reason the Council, in conjunction with the other chartered bodies, have felt it necessary to press for an amendment to Clause 1 of the Companies Bill now before Parliament, in order that the use of the word "chartered" in the title of a limited company engaged in professional work may be made illegal.

The condition of agriculture which was rendered critical by the disastrous season of 1927 was the subject of a Memorandum which, in addition to suggesting measures for immediate relief, pointed to fluctuations in the purchasing power of gold as a possible root cause of depression, and adduced evidence to show that a further enquiry by economists of the leading nations into the operation of the existing currency system is urgently needed. The Memorandum was forwarded to the Minister of Agriculture, and has already appeared in the Journal.

In congratulating the Institution of Civil Engineers on the attainment, in June, 1928, of the centenary of their incorporation by Royal Charter, the Council desire to record their indebtedness to that body for their courtesy in granting the use of their lecture hall for a number of Institution meetings during the session. The thanks of the Council are also due to the Institution of Mechanical Engineers and the College of Estate Management for similar services.

At the end of last session Mr. E. A. Rawlence (Vice-President) found it necessary to retire from the Council, to the great regret of those with whom he had been for so long associated in the administration of Institution affairs. The Council desire to take this opportunity of acknowledging their debt to Mr. Rawlence for the tireless and ungrudging service he has rendered to The Institution during his many years of office.

Membership.

In accordance with custom, tables showing comparative statistics of membership to date are given below.

The list of distinguished names which form the class of Honorary Members was increased during the session by the election of The Right Hon. The Viscount Lascelles, K.G., whose wide interest in agriculture and the management of land makes his connection with The Institution particularly appropriate; The Right Hon. The Earl Fitzwilliam, K.C.V.O., C.B.E., D.S.O., whose hospitality at Wentworth Woodhouse added so considerably to the pleasure of members who attended the Annual Summer Meeting at Harrogate; and Sir Charles Howell Thomas, C.M.G., whose appointment as Permanent Secretary of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries was announced early in the session. The selection of Sir Charles for one of the highest administrative positions in the Civil Service must be regarded not only as a fitting recognition of his individual qualities, but also as an honour reflecting upon the profession of which he was so well known a member. In according their congratulations to Sir Charles, the feelings of his colleagues on the Council were tempered only with regret that it was no longer possible for him to continue as one of their number.

In 1883, "Associates" were divided into "Ordinary" and "Professional" Associates.

Death has exacted a heavy toll from The Institution during the year, and has claimed many whose names had for long been eminent in the profession. Among those whose loss must be mourned are Mr. A. J. Nash, Farnham (1869); Sir Alexander Stenning, London (1877), a Past-President of The Institution; Mr. Frederick Downing, London (1878); Mr. Morgan H. Young, London (1878), a member of the Quantity Surveyors' Committee; Mr. H. C. Newmarch, London (1880), who had acted since 1890 as one of The Institution Auditors; Mr. C. E. Curtis, Brockenhurst (1880); Mr. W. H. Elwell, London (1881); Mr. T. J. Armstrong, Newcastle (1882); Sir Anker Simmons, K.B.E., Henley-on-Thames (1882); Mr. William Woodward, London (1882); Mr. A. W. Neate, Newbury (1882); Mr. James Grant, Llanidloes (1882); Mr. Thomas Dinwiddy, London (1883), a most generous supporter of the Benevolent Fund; Mr. E. Hugh Henry, London (1883); Mr. Walter Bird, London (1884); Mr. J. W. Willis Bund, C.B.E., Worcester (1884); Mr. G. H. Thynne, London (1884); Mr. H. J. Wyley, Bridgnorth (1884); Mr. John Parker, Hereford (1885); Mr. William Denton, Sheffield (1887); M. T. J. Green, Maidstone (1887); Mr. Henry Lovegrove, London (1887); Mr. G. C. Day, Shaftesbury (1887); Mr. Henry Swetenham, Chester (1887); Mr. W. C. Dendy, London, (1889); Mr. A. S. Pridmore, London (1890); Mr. H. S. Senior, Sturminster Newton (1890); and Mr. R. C. Gleed, London (1890), a past-Chairman of the Quantity Surveyors' Committee. Obituary notices of these and other well-known members have appeared in the Journal from time to time, and the Council are sure that their feelings of regret at the loss sustained by The Institution and of sympathy with the relatives will be shared by all members.

Finance.

While the accounts for the year show a balance of £1,699 in the total receipts from all sources over the total expenditure, the position is less satisfactory than these figures would seem to indicate. The total expenditure for the year exceeded the income from subscriptions and invested funds by £1,020, the credit balance being due to £1,183 received on account of entrance fees from new members (which is in the nature of capital) and surplus on the examination account due to the large entry of candidates in September, 1927. During the past three years there has been a tendency to draw more and more on those two extraneous accounts to meet the increasing expenditure on members in the shape of the Journal, the issue of memoranda, and the expenses of the County Branches and Junior Meetings. The examination account depends upon the number of candidates who enter, and with any considerable reduction in the number the expenses would speedily overtake the receipts from examination fees. It is therefore undesirable to rely on this account as a source of income, and care must be exercised to keep the heavy cost of printing within bounds by checking the tendency of the Journal to increase in size. The Executive Committees of County Branches are asked to bear this in mind when considering resolutions for the insertion in the Journal of Papers read at their meetings.

The Examinations.

The Special Test Examination, which is a scholastic test for candidates over 25 years of age, and an alternative to the Preliminary Examination, was held for the first time this year. The syllabus comprises papers in Advanced Arithmetic, Elements of Economics, Essay Writing, and General Knowledge. In order to ensure that future candidates for the Professional Examinations have attained a definite standard of general education, they will be required henceforward to have passed the Preliminary or the Special Test unless they can claim exemption on the ground of having passed a recognised public examination of equivalent standard.

It was decided during the year to grant exemption from the professional examinations to graduates of London University in the course of B.Sc. Estate Management who were desirous of attaining membership. This is the first occasion on which exemption from the professional examinations has been permitted, and the step conforms with the Council's policy of endeavouring to recruit each year into the profession a number of men with high academic qualifications.

The reports of the Examiners during the past few years have indicated that many candidates have found difficulty in grasping the principles underlying the knowledge they have acquired and in applying it to the practical problems of their future profession. During the year the Council referred the matter to their Education Committee, whose report proposed that the examinations should be so reorganised as to ensure that the training of candidates shall proceed by gradual stages from scholastic to technical instruction, with a proper grounding in the basic principles of knowledge necessary for the surveying profession. The scheme, of which details will be available at an early date, has been approved by the Council, and will operate for the first time at the examinations of 1932. By this means it is hoped that the dangers of mere superficial "cramming" will be avoided or minimised.

Tables C and D show the number of candidates who sat for the examinations and the number who passed.

Ninety-four candidates came up for re-examination in their Typical Subject, and of these 69 were successful.

The number of examinees sitting in Glasgow was 40, of whom 22 entered for the Intermediate, 14 for the Final, 1 for the Direct Fellowship, and 3 for the Typical Subjects only. Of these 25 satisfied the examiners, while 8 were referred back in Typical Subjects.

Nine candidates sat in Dublin, 2 for the Intermediate, 4 for the Final, and 3 for the Special Single Examination for degree-holders. Of these 5 were successful.

The Special Diploma Examinations.

Of the Special Diploma Examinations two were held in June, a sufficient number of candidates having presented themselves for the Diplomas in Rating and Forestry. Out of the thirteen candidates for the former the following were successful: Messrs. T. G. Daniels, F. G. Fleury, C. H. King (who was awarded the Rating Surveyors' Association Prize), F. O. Lyster, and W. S. Willis. Unfortunately, no candidate was successful of the five who entered for the Forestry Diploma Examination. The five Special Diploma Examinations are held triennially, and also in an intermediate year in any subject for which five or more candidates enter. The next triennial year falls in 1929.

The present abnormal demand for the services of surveyors able to undertake valuations for rating purposes has been reflected in the number of candidates for the Rating Diploma, which has now become generally recognised as indicating the expert in that branch of the profession. The Council, however, would urge members not to forget the advantages afforded by study of the other diploma subjects, namely, Forestry, Sanitary Science, Agricultural and Tenant-Right Valuations, and Land Surveying and Levelling.

Apart from the increasing value of the specialised knowledge thereby gained, the mental training provided by an advanced study of these subjects cannot but be beneficial professionally over a far wider field than that to which they immediately relate.

The Examiners.

The work falling upon the examiners was especially heavy this year owing to the exceptionally large number of candidates, and the Council desire to express the indebtedness of The Institution to them for the efficient manner in which they have fulfilled their arduous and responsible task. There are but few changes in personnel, these being due to retirement in each case. Mr. S. A. Kelly succeeded Mr. J. Luke as examiner in Town Planning and Development of Building Estates; Mr. H. W. Cubitt takes Constructive and Working Drawings (Non-Typical), in the place of Mr. A. Burnett Brown; Messrs. A. W. Davson and A. E. Baylis take Quantities (Non-Typical) in the Intermediate and Final Examinations respectively, vice Messrs. E. C. Harris and H. W. Langdon, who now examine in Quantities (Typical) Final Examination, vice Messrs. A. G. Cross and P. F. Gleed. In the Special Test Examination, held for the first time this year, Mr. James Steel examines in Economics, Mr. J. G. Elsworthy in Essay-Writing, Mr. W. S. Walker in General Knowledge, and Mr. C. A. Bennett in Advanced Arithmetic.

The Institution Scholarships.

Eleven candidates presented themselves for the competitive examination carried out by the Oxford and Cambridge Schools Examination Board in January for the four scholarships offered by The Institution, and tenable for three years at a recognised University in a course approved by the Council as of advantage to the surveyor's profession. The successful candidates were: Mr. W. K. Masters (Crypt School, Gloucester), who was awarded a Scholarship of £80; Mr. T. C. Robson (Westminster City School), Mr. R. J. Rackham (Holloway School), and Mr. G. S. Short (Battersea Grammar School), who were awarded scholarships of £50 each.

In order to meet the greatly increased cost of education, especially at the two older Universities, the Council have decided to offer two scholarships only in future, and to increase their value to £130, if held at Oxford or Cambridge, and £100 if held elsewhere. A proportion of the emoluments will be retained by the Council until the holder has fulfilled the prescribed conditions as to entering the profession and presenting himself for the professional examinations. By this means it is expected that the objects for which the scholarships were founded, viz., to raise the standing of the profession by recruiting each year a number of men with high academic qualifications, will be more fully attained.

The College of Estate Management.

In the recent professional examinations of the 351 candidates, including those from Scotland and Ireland who were successful in the Intermediate, and the 268 who passed the Final, 228 and 193 respectively were prepared by the College, as were 7 out of the 8 candidates successful in the Special Single Examination for degree-holders. All The Institution prizes and medals were obtained by students of the College.

Mr. J. G. Head was nominated a Governor of the College on the election of Mr. John Willmot as President. Mr. C. H. Gott was also so nominated to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Sir Charles Howell Thomas, C.M.G., as representing The Institution.

The Publications.

The following Papers have been read and discussed during the session:—

Date.	Subject of Paper.	Author.
1927. Nov. 14 ...	The Opening Address ...	The President.
Dec. 5 ...	Westminster Abbey: Its Royal and Mediæval Tombs	Lawrence E. Tanner (Visitor).
1928. Jan. 9 ...	The Reports of the Royal Commission on Mining Subsidence	Cecil H. Bailey (Fellow).
Feb. 6 ...	The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927	J. Leonard Crouch (Barrister-at-Law) (Associate).
March 5	The Estimation of Damage in Ancient Lights Disputes	Percy J. Waldram (Fellow).
April 2 ...	Agricultural Depression: Its Causes and Possible Cure	C. Dampier-Whetham, F.R.S. (Visitor).
May 7 ...	Report of the Royal Commission on Land Drainage in England and Wales	A general Discussion introduced by Mr. C. B. Fisher, C.B.E. (Senior Vice-President).

The number of members attending the Ordinary General Meetings has been fully maintained, and the discussions which have followed the Papers have proved of value in throwing additional light upon the subjects reviewed. Mr. Lawrence Tanner's Paper on "Westminster Abbey," illustrated by lantern slides, was a scholarly and instructive addition to that which he read in 1925, and for the second time proved to be a popular departure for these meetings. The Council desire to record their indebtedness both to those who have given time to the preparation of the Papers and to those who have studied them in the Journal and come prepared to speak. They would remind Junior Members that observations or questions by them are welcomed at these meetings.

A Memorandum on the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, has been prepared for the Council by Mr. Edgar Foa, Barrister-at-Law, and was issued to members in May. The Council hope that it may receive the close and careful study of all who are concerned in the management of business property, whether acting for lessors or lessees.

An index to the first six volumes (1921-1927) of the Journal was issued to members in February. It is hoped that this will prove a useful aid in referring to the mass of technical information which has been published during this period, and especially to the sections containing the "Queries " and Replies" and the "Law Cases."

The first edition of the "Standard Method of Measure- " ment" having become exhausted during the year, a second edition, in which all recent alterations and additions are incorporated, was printed. This fact may be taken as a welcome indication of the increasing use of this document in connection with building operations.

A standard form of articles of pupilage was prepared during the year, a step which the Council believe will meet a long-felt want. Copies may be obtained on application to The Institution.

In the Journal, apart from news of a purely domestic character, many articles and Papers of wide interest on current subjects have appeared. Every endeavour has been made to meet the demands of all branches of the profession, while the section dealing with "Government, Official and "other Publications" and the stages of proposed legislation has enabled members to keep themselves informed of the situation regarding matters closely affecting the profession.

The Library and Collections.

During the year a large number of new works and new editions of standard works of reference have been added to the Library. In this connection members are reminded that a suggestion book is kept so as to enable proposals for the purchase of suitable books to be made to the Library Committee. Those practising at a distance from London may forward recommendations by post for consideration by the Committee, the dates of whose meetings are inserted in the Journal from time to time.

Several additions to the Forestry Museum have been made during the year, and include a set of veneer panels in home-grown timber presented by Messrs. John Wright, Ltd., and an excellent example of Peridermium strobi, or Weymouth Pine Blister, from the Duke of Somerset's Maiden Bradley estate. A large exhibit dealing with the use of coppice wood for handles is now in course of preparation, and a considerable amount of minor alteration and rearrangement has also taken place. Some of the older plank specimens have been replaced, the remainder have been cleaned and planed, and specially fitted racks prepared to hold them. An exhibit was sent from the Museum, by special request, to the Bath and West Agricultural Show at Bath, the subject dealt with being "The Common Ash." It was awarded a special certificate as being of exceptional merit, and the thanks of the Council are due to Messrs. A. D. C. Le Sueur and G. L. Taylor for their work in arranging the exhibit.

The Standing and Special Committees.

During the year under review there have been twelve meetings of the Council and 91 meetings of the Standing and Special Committees, and the nature of the questions which the latter have been called upon to consider has been no less varied than in the past. The Council have received valuable assistance from other members of The Institution who have acted with them on these Committees.

The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, was closely followed during its course through both Houses of Parliament, and, in addition, the Architects Registration Bill, 1928, the Sheffield Corporation Bill, 1928, the Rating and Valuation Bill, 1928, the London County Council (General Powers) Bill, 1928, and the Landed Property Agents Registration Bill, 1928, were examined and reported upon, appropriate action being taken in each case.

The attention of the Quantity Surveyors' Committee was directed during the year to a case in which a bill of quantities prepared by a member on the instructions of a local authority had been altered and used by the latter without authority for a housing scheme initiated after the abandonment of that for which the bill was originally prepared. The opinion of Mr. Trevor Watson (Barrister-at-Law) was taken as to the legal remedy, if any, which might be sought by the surveyor, and this, together with a statement of the case referred to Counsel, has already appeared in the Journal.

The negotiations concerning the new standard form of building contract were concluded by the Joint Committee to which the drafting of that document had been referred. The new form has been referred to the Council of the several bodies represented on the Joint Committee for their consideration, and it may be hoped that a final decision on this important matter may shortly be reached. The thanks of the Council are due to Mr. J. E. Drower, C.B.E., for his valuable and untiring work as their representative on the Joint Committee.

Two meetings of members practising in quantities were arranged during the session by the Quantity Surveyors' Committee; the attendance and discussion at these meetings were eminently satisfactory and fully justified the innovation.

In co-operation with representatives of the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute the scale of professional charges was amended during the year, the revised document being issued to members on 1st January. The observations of The Institution were also invited by the London County Council in connection with the revision of district surveyors, fees, and were acknowledged in a report by the London Building Acts Committee of that authority.

The amendment of the law of rating in London and the preservation of London's squares and open spaces are questions affecting everyday life in the metropolis which have assumed importance during the year. As regards the former, a Memorandum was forwarded to the Minister of Health in anticipation of legislation which was expected during the present Parliamentary Session, but has not materialised, and, as regards the latter, evidence was given on behalf of The Institution by Mr. C. Gerald Eve (Member of Council) before the Royal Commission on London Squares. The Memorandum and Précis of Evidence respectively have already appeared in the Journal.

In response to a request by a Departmental Committee appointed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Report as to the directions in which simplification and codification of the existing law of Income Tax might be effected was prepared.

The registration of party-wall agreements and awards under the Land Charges Act, 1925.

The prescription of building and improvement lines under the Roads Improvement Act, 1925, and the Public Health Act, 1925.

Questions relating to interim development under town planning schemes.

The inconvenience caused to the public by the continuous breaking up of roads.

The provision of a standard British specification for concrete kerbs, channels and quadrants in Portland cement.

The principles to be observed in the laying out of cross-roads, junctions, and corners of highways.

In addition it may be mentioned that a special Committee was appointed to prepare the programme and consider the arrangements for the forthcoming Diamond Jubilee celebrations, for which the bulk of the work of preparation has fallen within the session now ending. The Council feel sure that members will join with them in gratitude to the Committee for the heavy task, which they have so loyally undertaken, of making the event in all respects worthy of its great occasion.

The list of the Standing Committees is as follows: Building, Council Selection, County Branches and Country Meetings, Education, Elections, Finance, General Purposes, Land Agents (a) Agricultural, (b) Forestry, Library and Sessional Papers, Mining, Parliamentary, Professional Practice, Quantity Surveyors.

The County Branches.

The Annual Conference between the Council and the Chairmen and Honorary Secretaries of County Branches, which was held on 6th February, was fully attended, and a valuable discussion on a number of affairs of domestic interest to The Institution took place. A report of the proceedings appeared in the March number of the Journal. Members desirous of placing any particular subject on the Conference Agenda Paper are requested to communicate with the Hon. Secretary of their branch before the end of November.

Among the many matters dealt with by the Branches during the year, two, perhaps, may be mentioned as being of wide interest to the public as well as to the profession. The Report on the Incidence of Local Rating on Housing and Industry in the Clyde Valley, prepared by the Scottish Branch and printed in the Journal for April, while covering only a particular and limited area, possesses a more than local significance as to the extent to which trade and enterprise are burdened by local taxation at the present time. Secondly, the Irish Branch have joined in a conference with the Royal Institute of the Architects of Ireland and the Institution of Civil Engineers (Ireland) to discuss the question of the statutory registration of the three professions in the Irish Free State.

The formation of a local committee of members in Ceylon was accomplished during the year for the purpose of assisting the Council in matters affecting The Institution in the colony.

During the year the President and Secretary have attended a large number of meetings of the County Branches and have greatly appreciated the welcome which they received. They have been impressed both by the keenness and regularity with which these meetings continue to be attended and by the excellence and professional value of the Papers read thereat. Reports of these activities have appeared each month in the Journal, and members, therefore, will already have been able to gauge the extent to which the Branches assist the Council in carrying on the work of The Institution by fostering local interest in its affairs, by providing opportunities for the discussion of technical and other problems to those who are unable to come to London, and by the promotion of social intercourse locally among members. The thanks of the Council are due to the Chairmen, Honorary Secretaries and Executive Committees for their services to The Institution in conducting the business of their respective Branches and for the most useful reports which they prepare for the Standing Committees from time to time.

The Annual Summer Meeting, which was held at Harrogate in June, proved most enjoyable, although the number of members attending was somewhat disappointing. Fine weather, however, is an indispensable requirement for the complete success of the meeting, and there can be little doubt that the heavy rains which continued throughout the week were responsible for the absence of many who would otherwise have been present. Those who took part will join in acknowledging their indebtedness to the Yorkshire Branch Reception Committee, who were responsible for the excellent arrangements made. A full account of the meeting was published in the August number of the Journal.

Junior Organisation.

The interest shown in the meetings of the Junior Organisation has been well maintained, the average attendance for the session being sixty-six. The standard of Papers read has been a high one, as has also that of the discussions which followed them.

The programme arranged for the evening meetings in London was as follows:—

Date.	Subject of Paper.	Author.	In Chair.
1927. Nov. 21	Regional Planning	F. W. Kuphal (P.A.S.I.)	The President.
Dec. 12	The Water Supply and Main Drainage of the Metropolis	C. I. V. Anderson (Probationer)	J. H. Salmon, M.B.E. (Fellow).
1928. Jan. 16	The Trend of Compulsory Purchase	F. H. Hodgkinson (P.A.S.I.)	H. C. Webster (Fellow).
Jan. 30	Mock Appeal before Quarter Sessions under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925	... ...	Sir H. Trustram Eve, K.B.E. (Fellow).
Feb. 13	The Agricultural Crises: some Causes and Remedies	F. P. Holme (Probationer)	Sydney Mager, C.B.E.
Mar. 12	The Evolution of Local Government	Frederick Cull (P.A.S.I.)	Frank Hunt, C.V.O. (Fellow).
Apr. 16	The Future of the Profession	Alfred C. Savill (P.A.S.I.)	Dendy Watney (Past-President).
May 23	Annual General Meeting.

Of these Papers those by Mr. F. W. Kuphal and Mr. C. I. V. Anderson were awarded the President's Prize and the Chartered Surveyors' (1913) Club Ryde Memorial Prize respectively.

The establishment of Junior Organisations within a number of County Branches has necessitated a revision of the Regulations and Rules of Procedure, so as to secure greater co-operation with headquarters. This was effected during the session, and the new Regulations have been approved by the Council and published.

The Annual Dinner was held in December at the Connaught Rooms and was well attended, the Senior Vice-President with several members of the Council and other distinguished guests being present. The Annual Dance was held in February at the Princes' Galleries, Piccadilly, and proved more popular and successful than ever. Some 400 guests were present, and this, together with the £90 by which the Benevolent Fund benefited from the sale of tickets, considerably exceeded all previous records for the event.

It is satisfactory to record that a new Junior Branch was formed for the area covered by the Hampshire, Dorset and South Wiltshire Branch during the year. Its initial meetings were attended with a success which has fully justified its formation. The same may be said of the remaining Junior Branches in Scotland, Lancashire, &c., Yorkshire, Warwickshire, &c., and Gloucestershire, &c., where the Papers, discussions and other activities indicate that the enthusiasm of the younger members and their interest in the corporate life of The Institution is increasing each year. The Council attach great importance to the work thus carried on by these organisations and to the training which the younger members are thereby afforded for administrative positions in the County Branches or on Standing Committees at The Institution. They sincerely hope that all Junior Members will realise the value of the system, and will prepare Papers for reading at the meetings and join in the discussions.

The Chairmen and Honorary Secretaries during the period under review have been as follows:—

——	Chairman.	Hon. Secretary.
Junior Committee ...	H. E. Gillett	H. D. A. Watney.
Junior Branches:—
Gloucester, &c. ...	F. C. Gibaud	E. P. Weller.
Hants, Dorset, &c. ...	——	J. S. Gates.
Lancashire, &c. ...	Ernest Burton	R. Poole.
Warwick, &c.	J. F. MacMahon	A. Melville Cave.
Yorkshire	C. E. Fox	A. B. Hepper.
Scotland	J. Dunn	J. C. Pinkerton, M.C.

The Employment Register.

Appointments were obtained through the Register by 109 applicants as against 80 last year, and of these 21 were in the land agency branch of the profession, 47 in the valuation branch, 22 were building surveyors, and 19 quantity surveyors. The demand for men with knowledge of valuing for local taxation purposes has been a marked feature of the year, and was greater than could be met by the Register.

The Register is intended to meet the needs of those requiring assistants as well as those seeking employment. The Council hope that Senior Members with vacancies to fill will make it a practice to communicate their requirements to the Secretary, and so help the Junior Members of The Institution.

Miscellaneous.

Apart from the matters already referred to under other headings, representatives have been nominated by the Council to act for The Institution on a number of conferences and committees set up or convened to investigate questions in which the profession is concerned. Among these may be mentioned conferences with the Ministry of Health and a number of other bodies in connection with proposals for the voluntary registration of owners of land affected by town planning schemes, whereby the present heavy cost of referencing to local authorities might be reduced and at the same time a sufficient notice to owners assured; with the Central Landowners' Association, the Land Agents' Society, and the National Farmers' Union, in connection with the returns which may be required by rating authorities under Section 40 of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, resulting from which a Memorandum has already appeared in the Journal; with the Land Agents' Society and other bodies in connection with the Rent Restrictions Acts; and with the Institution of Municipal and County Engineers to consider the effect of coal residues when used in concrete reinforced with steel.

The Council have assisted in the movement for the provision of playing fields accessible to overcrowded centres of population, and, with the co-operation of the County Branches, and of members who generously offered their services gratis, have furnished the National Playing Fields Association with a list of surveyors throughout the country who are prepared to act for that body in connection with the acquisition of suitable land. Similar steps were taken in connection with the relief of sufferers from the Thames floods in January (a contribution being also made to the Lord Mayor's Fund) and the provision of homes for ex-soldiers as a memorial to the late Lord Haig.

An official visit to the Shipping, Engineering and Machinery Exhibition at Olympia was arranged in September, and to the Empire Timber Exhibition at the Imperial Institute in March, both of which included much that was of great interest to the profession. The Council's thanks are due to the organisers for the courtesy and hospitality extended to The Institution.

Members practising in Quantities and as Building Surveyors will learn with interest that, by the Architects and Quantity Surveyors Act of South Africa, which received assent in June last year, statutory registration of the architectural and quantity surveying professions in that Dominion has been attained. The South African Institute of Quantity Surveyors, which was affiliated to The Institution, received statutory recognition, and has become incorporated, as the Chapter of South African Quantity Surveyors, with the Institute of South African Architects for the purposes of the Act. It is not, however, expected that these changes will necessitate discontinuance of their connection with The Institution. The Quantity Surveyors' representative on the Registration Board is Mr. A. T. Babbs (Fellow).

Members will learn with satisfaction that in addition to the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, statutory recognition was accorded to The Institution in the Bath Corporation

Act, 1925, and the Swansea Corporation Act, 1927, the President having been charged thereunder with the duty of nominating a Fellow of The Institution upon a Committee to advise these Corporations concerning the elevation of buildings.

Although it is not possible to present complete information concerning the honours gained and public work undertaken by members of The Institution during the year, the following particulars may be of interest.

The Royal Commission on Land Drainage, of which the Rt. Hon. Lord Bledisloe, P.C., K.B.E. (Hon. Member), was Chairman, and Lieut.-Colonel Sir George Courthope, Bart., M.C., M.P. (Associate), and Lieut.-Colonel Sir F. W. D. Drummond, K.B.E. (Fellow), Commissioners, issued their report during the year. Evidence for The Institution was given by Mr. C. B. Fisher, C.B.E., and Mr. J. E. Bidwell (Vice-Presidents).

The Royal Commission on London Squares which was set up during the year includes among its members Sir Howard Frank, Bart., G.B.E., K.C.B. (Fellow), and Mr. M. L. Gwyer, C.B. (Associate).

The Central Valuation Committee, upon which Colonel Joseph Spain (Fellow) was appointed as one of the Minister of Health's nominees, have issued their second, third and fourth series of representations.

The Royal Commission on Mining Subsidence, which was appointed in 1923, and included Mr. J. D. Wallis (Past-President) and Lieut.-Colonel G. A. Lewis, C.M.G. (Fellow), as Commissioners, issued their final report in June.

Lord Bledisloe, P.C., K.B.E. (Honorary Member), was appointed Chairman of the Imperial Agricultural Research Conference held in October, and represented His Majesty's Government on a mission to South America in connection with agricultural affairs.

Mr. W. H. Overton (Fellow) was nominated to represent The Institution at the Royal Sanitary Institute Congress held at Hastings in July.

The services of Mr. J. E. Drower, C.B.E. (Fellow), who had acted as quantity surveyor for the Memorial to the Missing at the Menin Gate, were publicly recognised at the unveiling ceremony, after which he was presented to the King of the Belgians.

Mr. Cuthbert Lake (Fellow) and Mr. J. M. Theobald (Fellow) were nominated to represent The Institution upon a committee set up by The Polytechnic, Regent Street, W. 1, to advise the school in connection with their architectural courses; and Mr. C. H. Gott (Fellow) and Mr. Alexander Goddard, C.B.E. (Secretary), are representing The Institution on an expert committee appointed to advise the Senate of London University in connection with their degree in Estate Management.

The President and Secretary were appointed to represent The Institution at the Public Works, Roads and Transport Congress and Exhibition held in November.

The President was appointed to represent The Institution at the celebrations to commemorate the hundredth anniversary of the grant of a Royal Charter to the Institution of Civil Engineers.

A meeting of the International Federation of Surveyors, of which The Institution is a constituent body, was held in Paris in June, Messrs. J. E. Drower, C.B.E., and Colonel H. C. Cole, C.B.E. (Vice-President and Hon. Secretary of the Federation), attending on behalf of The Institution.

During the session Sir Francis Floud, K.C.B. (Hon. Member), was appointed Chairman of the Board of Customs and Excise; Sir Harry Courthope-Monroe, K.C. (Associate), received the appointment of Recorder of Sudbury, which he holds under Royal Warrant; and Mr. C. H. Gott (Fellow) succeeded Sir Charles Howell-Thomas, C.M.G., as Chief Valuer to the Board of Inland Revenue.

It is satisfactory to record that thirteen members, of whom five hold the Special Diploma in Rating, have received appointments as County Valuation Officers under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925.

Mr. Thomas Adams (Fellow), whose firm are consultants for the regional plan of New York and its environs, was elected an honorary member of the American Institute of Architects for his services to the ideals of the architectural profession.

Colonel S. Chatfeild Clarke, V.D. (Fellow), was appointed a Deputy-Lieutenant of the Isle of Wight by the Governors and Captain H.R.H. Princess Beatrice.

Since the publication of the last Annual Report the following honours have been conferred on members:—

Lieut.-Col. F. D. W. Drummond (Fellow)	K.B.E.
Mr. J. B. Slade (Fellow)	Knighthood.
Mr. A. Blair (Fellow)	C.B.E.
Mr. V. L. O. Sheppard (Fellow)	C.B.E.
Mr. G. F. Royds (Colonial Fellow)	O.B.E.
Mr. H. Ryle (Fellow)	M.V.O.
Major E. M. Holmes (Fellow)	M.B.E.
Mr. J. E. Drower, C.B.E. (Fellow)	Palmes Académiques (France).
M. J. S. Roupcinsky (Hon. Member)	Legion of Honour (Fr.) and Order of Leopold (Belgium).

ADDENDUM.

Notes from the Reports of the Examiners, 1928.

Apart from their comments concerning the technical side of candidates' work at the examinations this year, the examiners have again found cause to remark upon certain general features which give little cause for satisfaction. Bad spelling, indifferent English, illegible handwriting, want of accuracy and method, failure to understand carefully framed questions, and in some cases even to read them, have lost valuable marks which would have been saved by a little thoughtfulness in the examination-room. Lack of neatness in presenting answers, and a too frequent disregard of the instructions to candidates as to the numerical order in which their replies should be given, was also evident. Candidates who prefer to write their answers otherwise than in the order of the questions set should be careful to write each answer on a separate sheet of paper.

Apart from these signs of carelessness, there was a tendency to give vague or verbose answers where precision and brevity were required. Reports and specifications were inclined to become disquisitions; on the other hand many candidates attempted to condense into three or four lines their description of the geological characteristics of a county. Too few remembered that simple sketches may frequently be used with advantage.

Although in some respects improvement was shown in the legal and scientific papers, these subjects still appear to be approached with a desire to anticipate questions in the examination rather than to acquire a sound knowledge of underlying principles. This would account for the failure of many candidates to apply their knowledge to practice, a matter of the utmost importance to them later when the practical problems of their profession must be faced.

Sub-Division I.

Agricultural Valuations.—Few candidates realised that where land is to be acquired under compulsory powers, a tenant's interest extends to the date at which the tenancy can be terminated by notice to quit. Having regard to the many purposes for which land may now be compulsorily acquired, this subject is important. The examiner has also remarked upon the tendency of some candidates to suggest that values should vary according to the party represented.

Land Drainage.—Candidates appeared to show a want of knowledge of the Land Drainage Acts, and to be unfamiliar with methods of wet-weather provision for run-off in open channels.

Animal Physiology and Anatomy.—A better knowledge might fairly have been expected concerning the appearance of contagious diseases requiring notification.

Agricultural Law.—Insufficient acquaintance with the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, regarding dilapidations, compensation, and the termination of a tenancy, was shown.

Geology and Soils.—Knowledge of the outlines of the geology of counties, such as might be expected of a professional land agent, was deficient.

Report.—Descriptions of property good; but in some cases weakness was shown in calculating building values, and in showing outgoings correctly.

Agricultural Chemistry.—The standard of knowledge generally was higher, but the increasing importance of the sugar-beet crop to farming and the farmer has apparently received too little attention.

Enfranchisement of Copyholds.—The papers were badly done by all candidates. The calculations of enfranchisement consideration were especially poor.

Agricultural Botany.—Many candidates were deficient in knowledge of hay mixtures and their use in different types of soil.

Forestry (Indoor).—More study should be given to the insect enemies of trees.

Sub-Division II.

Report.—Too many candidates were content to repeat the question asked without amplifying the facts given with their own advice on the subject, and failed to remember the dangers of undue generalisation on the one hand, and the over-weighting of their report with detail on the other. It may ordinarily be assumed that a client is well aware of the general nature of his property, and that minute elaboration of detail is unnecessary in reporting upon it. In many cases the quality of candidates' English left much to be desired.

Sub-Division III.

Quantities.—The standard generally was extremely poor. Disregard of accuracy, lack of method and frequently a complete ignorance of first principles governing the practice of quantity surveying, were, with few exceptions, conspicuous. Most candidates either showed little acquaintance with the "Standard Method of Measurement" or had merely acquired book knowledge of it without being able to apply it in a practical manner. Examples of this were: (a) Where stone dressings to a brick-faced building were to be measured, 90 per cent. of the candidates in one sub-division measured a small stone plinth course by the method of measuring "Labours in "detail," whereas the practical method would have been per foot lineal by the method known as "Stone and all labour." (b) In another sub-division several candidates interpreted the limits of size laid down in the "Standard Method" as dimensions, e.g., in taking the form work to a small beam in feet run "not exceeding 36 inches girth" instead of taking the actual girth.

Other unsatisfactory features of the work this year were failure to show on waste how dimensions are arrived at; insufficient marginal notes; and failure to connect dimensions or follow them up in proper sequence.

Constructive and Working Drawings.—Draughtmanship as a whole was poor, even in the case of candidates taking the higher paper in this subject. Those taking the lower papers in many cases were deficient in knowledge of steel construction.

Iron and Timber Roofs.—Many candidates lacked knowledge of the design of mansard roofs; timber and open-shed roofs require more attention. Many of the open-shed roofs designed by candidates would have collapsed; a 3-inch eaves plate only was provided to carry rafters over a 12-foot span, the fact that there must be upward wind pressure in an open shed being forgotten. In some cases the supports were excessively strong.

House Drainage and Plumbers' Work. — The standard generally was extremely poor, and the examiner has drawn attention in particular to inaccurate levelling, some 47 per cent. of the candidates being apparently unable to give a correct reading on the level staff; many drainage schemes, otherwise sound, were rendered impracticable by the candidate having treated the site as flat although "spot levels" were given. In many cases 1 in 40 was stated as the fall of a pipe line, although the levels showed a gradient of less than 1 in 100. Half the candidates were unable to make a joint in an iron drain pipe with hot lead; very few realised that defects in anti-syphonage pipes and jointing are never obvious, and may often, therefore, be the source of escape of foul air indoors; and not one candidate remembered the advantages of using an air-gauge rather than a smoke machine for testing an inaccessible vent pipe. Ventilation was not understood; many candidates seemed erroneously to believe that the reduplication of openings in a pipe would, in itself, produce circulation of air, whereas actually it may induce stagnation.

Report.—Generally poor; there was a noticeable failure to arrange and express facts in a form readily intelligible to a client or to grasp the points on which advice is required. While many candidates appeared to possess sufficient theoretical knowledge, they failed to apply it to the difficulties met with in practice.

Sub-Division IV.

Principles of Mine Surveying.—General standard very poor; the compulsory question was badly done, and most candidates showed little knowledge of the essential principles to be observed in obtaining a correct magnetic azimuth.

General Subjects.

Law of Arbitration.—The standard generally has improved, but candidates appeared to have given too little attention to the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919.

Town Planning and Building Estates.—Candidates showed special want of preparation in recent legislation affecting this subject, e.g., in the Roads Improvement Act, 1925, and the Public Health (Amendment) Act, 1925. They appeared to find difficulty in applying the provisions of the Town Planning Act, 1925, to specific cases.

Law of Dilapidations.—While marked improvement was shown by candidates in knowledge of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Measure, 1923, and in drafting and repairing covenants, the standard, as a whole, was below that of previous years. There was much evidence of guessing at answers to the questions, and candidates generally were not up to date in their knowledge of the recent statutes and case law affecting the subject.

Surveying and Levelling.—Although 75 per cent. of the candidates were aware of Simpson's rule, only 33 per cent.

were capable of applying it accurately. Map reading, adjustment of instruments and logarithmic working were poor, and difficulty was generally experienced in working out a traverse.

Book-keeping.—The questions involving the preparation of a balance-sheet and profit and loss account were indifferently answered, as also was that upon the correction of errors in books.

Law of Fixtures, Dilapidations, and Easements.—Many candidates failed in knowledge of the law relating to dangerous structures, especially in the metropolis. The majority did not appreciate the effect of Colls v. The Home and Colonial Stores upon the question of whether an injunction would be granted to restrain the erection of an obstruction leaving an amount of light not reasonably sufficient for the ordinary purposes of a studio or any business requiring an unusually good light.

Road-making.—Most candidates were unfamiliar with the details of road construction, and appear to have given too little attention to sketching and prices. Text-books long out of date seem to have been studied, and details specified which have been proved by experience to be unsatisfactory.

AFFILIATED SOCIETY:

SOUTH AFRICAN INSTITUTE OF QUANTITY SURVEYORS (INCORPORATED),
26-27, Connaught Buildings, St. Andries Street,
Pretoria, Transvaal.

The Surveyors' Institution

(Incorporated by Royal Charter)

Is established—

1. To secure the advancement and facilitate the acquisition of that knowledge which constitutes the profession of a Surveyor, viz.—the art of determining the value of all descriptions of landed, mineral and house property, and of the various interests therein; the practice of managing and developing estates; and the science of admeasuring and delineating the physical features of the earth, and of measuring and estimating artificers' work.
2. To promote the general interests of the profession, and to maintain and extend its usefulness for the public advantage.

The Institution was established in 1868 and is incorporated under a Royal Charter, granted in 1881, and a Supplemental Charter, granted in 1921.

MEMBERSHIP.

The total membership of the Institution is over 6,700, and consists of four classes, viz.: Honorary Members, Fellows, Professional Associates, and Associates. There are also classes of Probationers and Students attached to, but not corporate members of, the Institution.

Students.—In order to qualify for admission to the Class of Students, candidates must be between the ages of 18 and 21, must have passed either the Preliminary Examination of the Institution or one of the specified Examinations accepted in lieu thereof, and must be either (1) pupils or technical assistants in the offices of members of the Institution or other persons substantially engaged in one or other of the branches of the profession as defined above; or (2) studying with a view to entering the profession at such places of professional instruction as the Council may approve.

Candidates under the age of 21 are advised to become Students; for, in addition to the use of the Library and Loan Library, receipt of the Journal and the right to attend meetings, they are entitled to substantial advantages in the Professional Examinations in respect of fees and percentage of pass marks.

Students remain attached to their class until the end of the calendar year in which they attain the age of 21, and may then be enrolled in the class of Probationers.

PROBATIONERS are persons whose period of Studentship has expired or who have passed the Intermediate Examination. They may continue as Probationers until the end of the calendar year during which they shall have been for five years enrolled in that class, or until the end of the third calendar year after that in which they passed the Intermediate Examination, whichever period first terminates.

All candidates for the Intermediate Examination are required to give an undertaking that, if successful in passing, they will forthwith become Probationers and so remain for the full term allowed by the By-Laws.

Probationers are entitled to use the Library and Loan Library, to attend meetings and to receive the publications.

PROFESSIONAL ASSOCIATES.—Candidates desirous of election to the class of Professional Associates must be not less than 21 years of age, and must have passed the Preliminary Examination (or an examination accepted in lieu thereof) and the Intermediate and Final Examinations. Candidates holding a University degree in subjects approved by the Council as appertaining to the surveying profession may take a single examination in place of the Intermediate and Final. After passing the examinations, candidates are eligible for election to the class of Professional Associates, provided that they are no longer in statu pupillari and are actually engaged in professional work as Surveyors.

FELLOWS.—Candidates must be not less than 30 years of age, must have passed either (1) the Preliminary or an exempting examination and the Intermediate and Final Examinations, or (2) the Direct Fellowship Examination; and must have held for five years, and be holding, a position of complete responsibility equivalent to that of a principal in an established business.

There are special arrangements for the election of Colonial Fellows.

ASSOCIATES must be persons over 21 years of age, not Surveyors by profession, whose pursuits are such as to qualify them to co-operate with Surveyors in the advancement of professional knowledge.

Honorary Members must be persons who, either by reason of their position or experience, or their eminence in science, may be enabled to render assistance in promoting the objects of the Institution; but are not engaged in practice as Surveyors in Great Britain or Ireland. They have the privilege of being present and taking part in all Ordinary General Meetings, and of access to the Library, but no right of voting, discussing or otherwise interfering in the affairs of the Institution; nor are they called upon to contribute to its funds.

Election to Membership, other than Honorary Membership, is by ballot of all the corporate members of the Institution. All Fellows, Professional Associates and Associates are required, within twelve months of their election, to attend an Ordinary General Meeting, or, in the case of members residing at a distance from London, a meeting of their County Branch, for the purpose of formal introduction, and to sign the Register. They are also required, within the same period, to deliver to the Council an original paper on a subject connected with the profession, or to make a donation to the Library Fund.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION.

The following are the rates of contribution to the funds :—

	Annual Subscription.			Admission Fee.

EXAMINATIONS.

The Preliminary and Special Examinations.—Any candidate intending to follow the profession of Surveyor will be accepted on application, but acceptance for the Preliminary Examination does not imply that a candidate, if successful in passing, will necessarily be regarded as eligible for enrolment as a Student, or for admission to the Intermediate and Final Examinations. There are no age limits, but candidates over the age of 25 are permitted to sit for a special Examination, instead of the Preliminary, to test their general knowledge and education. The entrance fee for the examination is £1 11*s.* 6*d.*

THE INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATION.—Candidates must be 19 years of age or over, and, unless studying at a recognised place of instruction, must be a pupil or technical assistant* in the office of a member of the Institution or other person substantially engaged in the profession of Surveyor as defined above. The entrance fee for the Examination is £4 4*s*. 0*d*.

THE FINAL EXAMINATION is open to candidates who have passed the Intermediate Examination; the entrance fee is £4 4*s*. 0*d*.

THE DIRECT FELLOWSHIP EXAMINATION.—Candidates for this Examination must be more than 30 years of age, and their position must be such as would make them eligible for direct election as Fellows on passing the Examination. The entrance fee is £5 5*s*. 0*d*.

The Preliminary and Special Examinations are held annually in January, and the Intermediate, Final and Direct Fellowship Examinations in March. Applications to sit for any one of the Examinations must be on the prescribed forms and must be submitted, together with the examination fees, during the previous September.

The Intermediate, Final, and Direct Fellowship Examinations are divided into four Sub-Divisions, to cover the four main branches into which the profession may roughly be divided, viz.:—I., Chiefly Land Agency; II., Chiefly Valuation; III., Chiefly Building or Quantities; and IV., Chiefly Mining. Candidates may elect to be examined in any one of these sub-divisions, but those proceeding to the Final Examination after passing the Intermediate must do so in the same sub-division.

THE SPECIAL SINGLE EXAMINATION for holders of University degrees in a course of study approved by the Council as bearing upon the profession, is held concurrently with the other professional examinations, and combines the subjects required to be taken in both the Intermediate and Final. Entrance fee £4 4s.

Copies of the rules governing the examinations and giving full particulars thereof, may be obtained from the Secretary on application. The detailed Syllabus and List of Text-Books (which relates to the professional examinations only) can be obtained at a charge of 1*s*., and past examination papers at 2*s*. for each annual set.

* Articles, although much to be recommended as a method of training for the profession, are not an essential condition of admission to the Examinations.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERSHIP.

Fellows and Professional Associates are permitted to place the initials F.S.I. and P.A.S.I. respectively after their names, and to use the designation "Chartered Surveyor," subject to the provisions of the By-Laws.

Members, both corporate and non-corporate, have the right to attend the Ordinary General Meetings, meetings of their County Branch, and, if under 33 years of age, the Junior Meetings, and have the privilege of introducing visitors. They receive the Journal, which is issued in twelve monthly parts, and a copy of any other printed publication issued by the Institution. They may avail themselves of the Queries and Replies section of the Journal, and so secure the benefit of the knowledge and experience of fellow members in questions arising in daily practice. They may use the Library and Loan Library and the Employment Register.

The Incorporated Benevolent Fund of the Institution is established to provide for the needs of members and their dependents who, by reason of age, sickness or other unavoidable misfortune, are unable to support themselves. It is maintained entirely by voluntary contributions.

ORGANIZATION AND WORK.

The affairs of the Institution are under the management of a Council, elected annually by ballot of all corporate members. The Council are advised by the County Branches and a number of Standing and Special Committees appointed to consider the various matters referred to them. Their work includes the examination of Parliamentary Bills affecting the valuation, management, and development of landed property, and the various interests therein ; the preparation of memoranda, and the submission of evidence for the use of Government Departments, Royal Commissions and departmental and other Committees in connection with matters upon which the collective knowledge of the profession would prove of assistance ; and the rendering of advice to Imperial or Local Authorities when called upon to do so by statute or otherwise.

In addition to their activities in the advancement of the public interest, the Council have continually in view the elevation, ethical as well as intellectual, of the profession which they represent. In addition to the practical help which they have afforded to places of professional instruction, the foundation of scholarships and the furtherance of technical education generally, they have felt it their duty strictly to administer the rules of conduct which all members are required by the By-Laws to observe. The Council have also, through their Professional Practice Committee, used their influence in inspiring a high ideal of professional honour among members.

The Session of the Institution commences annually on the Second Monday in November, and continues to the end of May. The Ordinary General Meetings are held monthly during the Session, and in addition two Meetings of members practising in Quantities are arranged. At these Meetings original papers on professional subjects are read and their merits fully and freely discussed. Every member has the privilege of introducing visitors.

THE COUNTY BRANCHES.

The organization of the Institution includes a system of Metropolitan and County Branches, the object of which is to enable the Council to give the considered views of the profession from all parts of the country on matters of public interest; to afford opportunity for members generally to take an active part in the affairs of the Institution; and to assist the Council in ascertaining their local wants and wishes. The system includes machinery for local representation on, and succession to, the Council and Standing Committees and provides, in addition, opportunities for the discussion of professional questions and social intercourse at centres easily accessible to members in country districts. The affairs of each Metropolitan and County Branch are managed by an Executive Committee elected annually.

THE JUNIOR MEETINGS.

The Junior Meetings are established for the benefit of the younger members of the Institution, to bring them into closer touch with the Council, and, by fostering among them an interest in professional affairs, to prepare them for higher office in the future. The work of the Junior Meetings is administered by a representative Central Executive Committee which is responsible to the Council for their affairs as a whole. Junior organizations in the County Branches have been established where justified by numbers and the existence of accessible local centres.

SCHOLARSHIPS AND PRIZES.

Four Scholarships are offered annually by the Institution, two of which are of £80 per annum and two of £50, each being tenable for three years at any recognised University in an Honours course approved by the Council as bearing upon one or other of the branches of the Surveyor's profession. They may be held only by Students of the Institution or by those undertaking to become Students. Under the conditions of tenure an Institution Scholar must agree, at the completion of his course at the University, to enter the office of a Surveyor with a view to his practising as such in the future, and to pass the professional examinations of the Institution. Particulars may be obtained on application to the Secretary.

A number of valuable prizes are offered in connection with tbe Institution Examinations.

THE LIBRARY AND COLLECTIONS.

The Institution Library contains approximately 12,000 volumes, and includes a topographical section comprising the great County Histories, all the principal local histories, and a London collection ; a series of works on British Agriculture, both ancient and modern, and the allied subjects of Forestry, Geology, Botany, Agricultural Chemistry and Vegetable Physiology ; a complete series of professional text-books, including the latest works ; works of general science ; the Public General Statutes from the earliest times ; Law Reports and Law Text-books ; Parliamentary Papers and Reports ; the Transactions of kindred societies and general works of reference. It also contains a number of valuable single works and rare editions of special interest to the book-lover, as well as a collection of old maps, charts and plans.

The Loan Library is independent of the General Reference Library, and contains some 1,600 volumes, including all the principal professional text-books, which may be borrowed by members according to the prescribed rules.

The Forestry Collection contains a series of home-grown timber exhibits in planks and sections ; preserved specimens of the foliage, flowers and fruit of the more common British trees and of timber insects, injurious and otherwise ; and a collection of saws, tools and other implements used in forestry. Various causes of damage to timber and the commercial uses to which British woods may be put, are also illustrated.

The Geological Museum includes specimens of the fossils found in British geological formations and a collection of stones used in building.
